Mr. THURMAN. That is what I said, or at least what I intended to say. I do not know myself, except upon this new theory of the late Mr. Davis, how counting the votes and being a judge are not one and the same thing where any judicial question arises. When, for instance, the question is whether a return is in conformity with the statute, it seems to me the decision upon that is in its nature judicial, and not ministerial. When the question is between two returns from the same State, it does seem to my poor comprehension that the decision of that question is judicial in its nature, and not ministerial. That is the reason why I said that the power to count the votes does involve a power of judging what votes shall be counted and what votes shall be rejected. That being the case, I do not see for myself, as I said before, how upon the language of the Constitution the idea can be entertained that the President of the Senate is this judge.

The Senator reads a very able argument by the late Mr. Davis, which I never heard before, and to which I have listened with very great attention, at least all of it that he has read since I have come into the Senate, but if I apprehend what I heard, without knowing what preceded it, Mr. Davis did not entertain the opinion, but entertained directly the opposite opinion, that the President of the Senate was the judge in this matter. He supposes that when the returns are brought in they are to be counted. He says, however, that it does not matter whether they are counted or not, that the question whether or not those returns show an election of President is to be determined by the Honse of Representatives alone on a motion to go into the election of a President on the theory that the people have failed to elect, and in the same way that the Senate is to decide in respect to the Vice-President whether there has been an election or not. That, I understand, is his theory. It seems to me that it is not a sound theory; but if it were a sound theory, it would certainly show that the decision does not rest with the President of the Senate. Certainly Mr. Davis's opinion is distinctly against the power of the President of the Senate to decide the question.

But I do not quite understand that reasoning, I must confess; and I think that if a case had been brought to the attention of Mr. Davis, who was a very able man indeed, the very case presented by the second section of this bill, he would have had to give a reconsideration to the argument he made. He says that the two Houses are present at the opening of these votes to identify the returns, the Senate as a Senate and the House of Representatives as a House; that they are there to identify them.

Mr. MORTON. How?

Mr. THURMAN. How they are to identify them he does not say.

He says they are there to identify them. Identify what? Identify certain pieces of paper which are laid upon the desk, or identify which is the true return? If it is meant simply to identify the papers which have been opened by the President of the Senate and laid upon the lack them they are there simply as witnesses to testify that two parallels. desk, then they are there simply as witnesses to testify that two papers from a single State, in the case of two returns being made from it, have been laid on the table, and there is no decision and no count; for according to Mr. Davis's argument that question then cannot be decided; the vote of the State cannot then be counted. The Constitution says the vote shall then be counted. His plan says the vote shall not be counted. That is what it comes to. If there are two returns, and if there is no power of decision in the President of the Senate, as he seems to admit, nor any power of decision in the Senate and House of Representatives there, then the plain provision of the Constitution that "the votes shall then be counted" becomes a nullity, for you do not count the votes then at all; but instead of then counting the votes, as the Constitution requires, you are simply to identify certain papers, and when the Senate has returned to its Chamber without any count of the votes of the State from which two returns have come, and without any declaration who has been elected, after that has taken place the House of Representatives is to go into the inquiry whether the vote of that State shall be counted, or which one of the certificates for that State shall be counted. Is that the Constitutution? Is that the Constitution which declares that the votes "shall then be counted," and if it appear that no one has received a majority of all the votes the House of Representatives shall "proceed immediately" to elect a President I is that it? I must confess, with great respect for the ability of the late Mr. Davis, I cannot see it. And it does seem to me that all this wandering about, with this plan, that plan, and the other plan, this interpretation and that interpretation, comes from losing sight of the plain provision of the Constitution and the fundamental principle of government, that where a thing is directed to be done and the mode is not prescribed by the Constitution, it belongs to the law-making power to provide for it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, in considering this question we have to take the Constitution as it is, and not as we think it ought to be. It is agreed, I believe on all hands, that a better mode than the present for the election of President and Vice-President of the United States ought to be provided if possible; but until that is done by an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, we have to adapt our legislation and whatever we do in this regard to the existing provisions of that instrument.

The electoral college is just as much a constitutional body as the Senate and House of Representatives. It is equally established by the Constitution. We are bound to recognize it and to recognize the fact that it provides for an election of President and Vice-President partly by the States. The election of President and Vice-President is not merely the act of voting by the people, but it consists in everything necessary to elect the President and declare the result. The election consists, first, of the voting by the people; next, of the meeting of the electors in the several States and the casting of their votes; and then the certifying of those votes to the President of the Senate and of the assembling of the two Houses together and ascertaining the result in joint convention and declaring such result. All these things are necessary to make a complete election. If you stop at the vote of the people, the result is never ascertained. Altogether they constitute what we call the election of President and Vice-President; and in framing any law for the purpose of settling a disputed quesconnected with it, or to do anything necessary to carry out the constitutional provision relating to it, we must have regard to the provisions of the Constitution regulating the whole matter and what was intended by the instrument itself, by the framers of the Consti-

One thing that stands out prominently is that the States, as such, irrespective of their size or population, were to have a voice in the election of these two officers. When the Constitution was adopted the States were different in size, as they are now. It was known then that that inequality existed; it was known then that the time never would be when the States would be equal in size and population, but that that same inequality which existed then would go on as long as the United States lasted. Therefore the argument now that the States are so unequal in size is no reason why the original provision of the Constitution giving the States their due weight in the election of these two officers should be disregarded. It was a provision intended for the protection of the smaller States. They were bodiespolitic; they had their rights; there was danger that they would be overslaughed by the larger States, and that their rights would be destroyed by the greater representation that other States had in the House of Representatives. In order to protect them against that, the States were given a representation without regard to size in this body and also in the electoral college. Then I insist that any law passed on this subject must be passed with respect to these particular features and purposes of the Constitution which were to protect the smaller States against the dangers arising from the preponderance of the larger

Now, Mr. President, how do the electoral colleges vote? They vote by States. Each State elects a number of electors equal to her representation in the House and in the Senate. The State of Delaware elects three, the State of Virginia eleven, the State of New York thirty-five. When these electors meet together, those representing the States and those representing the people, they constitute one body in each State, and cast their votes as one body. They cast the vote of their State, and a majority casts it, if that majority be only

Now, to keep up the analogies of the Constitution and the unities of the Constitution, I insist that whatever we do in this regard shall be done in the same meaning, and in the same sense, and for the same purpose that the electoral college acts. We must endeavor to preserve the symmetry of our system, we must strive, in every step we take toward electing a President and Vice-President and declaring the result, to preserve the same analogies that guided the convention in establishing the electoral college and the mode of electing the President and Vice-President. Any departure from that, anything going outside of that, is a violation of the purposes of the Constitution and the intentions of the framers of it, and should therefore not be adopted.

Hence, when it comes to the decision of any important question connected with the election of these officers, and to deciding which of two returns is the vote of a State, upon which decision the result of the election may turn, why is it not proper that that question should be decided upon the same principle, rule, and reasons that regulate the election of President in its other phases? If it was proper that the President should be elected by a joint vote of the people and the States; if it was proper that the electoral college should be constituted partly of the States and partly of the people, is it not equally proper that a question upon the decision of which the result may turn proper that a question upon the decision of which the result may turn should be decided in the same way that the election itself was intended to be decided? Certainly when we do that we keep up what the framers of the Constitution intended and we preserve the purpose of the instrument. If we go outside and adopt any plan different from or beyond that, we depart to that extent precisely from what was intended in the original framing of the Constitution; and, therefore, we do what was never intended and what is contrary to the interpretation. strument itself.

The Senator from Indiana proposes to let the judges of the Supreme Court, not sitting as a court but as individuals, decide this question in the last resort, and he does it upon the ground that letting the Senate and House of Representatives decide it is anti-republican, be-cause the States would thus be represented in the decision. It seems to me that if the Constitution intended that the States should be to me that if the Constitution intended that the States should be represented in all these questions, it cannot be contended that it is anti-republican. It is the purpose of the Constitution itself that the States should be represented; and when an amendment is offered which declares that the States shall not be represented as to any particular thing arising in this election, to that extent we depart from the Constitution and from our republican institutions. The members of this body and the members of the House of Representatives were elected by the people partly to perform these very functions. They were chosen for the purpose, among others, of deciding who in a cer-tain contingency should be President and who Vice-President. When the people voted for them, they delegated them to fulfill those duties; they elected them for that purpose as well as other purposes; and when we leave the question with the men thus elected by the people, we leave it where republican government ought to leave it, with the people or with the representatives of the people. But if we take it away from them and give it to nine other men never selected by the people, knowing little of the people, necessarily by the very nature of their functions and duties removed from the people and in no sense representing them, we get the decision of that great question away from a representative body of men to a body never elected by the people and having little connection with them. I can imagine no provision that would be further from the spirit of the Constitution and of our republican institutions, unless it would be to select six or eight of the ministers who represent foreign governments in this city and let them be constituted a court to decide upon this question. That would be just as far from my idea of what constitutes a republican government which is a representative government as the proposition submitted by the Senator from Indiana. I think, therefore,

Then I think the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH, ] to a certain extent incorporating my view, is yet defective in one very important particular, and that is in its practical working. Now observe in what that defect consists. The two Houses meet together in the Hall of the House of Representatives to count the votes. If there is no objection made and the votes are simply counted throughout without any question arising, the two Houses do not separate at all until all the votes are counted and the result announced; but whenever a question arises to be decided the two Houses separate at once, and the Senate returns to its Chamber and the House remains in its, and each proceeds to act for itself on the disputed point. Suppose there be two returns from a State, and it becomes necessary to decide which is the right one. The two Houses separate, and each proceeds to act upon the question. After they have acted, the Senate is notified of the readiness of the House to receive them and returns to the Hall of the House of Representatives, and there it is ascertained that the House has decided in favor of one and there it is ascertained that the House has decided in favor of one return and the Senate in favor of the other. Now, the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey is that in that event the President of the Senate shall proceed to declare which return shall be counted, and shall base his decision upon a majority vote of the two bodies. But does not this practical difficulty arise: The vote of the House has been given in the absence of the Senate and of the President of the Senate; he does not know what it was; and the amendment provides no means of ascertaining what vote the House has given.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to know whether the President of the Senate would not have the same means of ascertaining the vote of the House as he has of ascertaining that the House has disagreed at all. If he is competent to receive one message he is competent at all. If he is competent to receive one message he is competent to receive both; and therefore the information is within his grasp and within his official grasp, as it seems to me.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think not, sir; because all that the Senate learns when it returns to the House is simply the result. How that has been attained there is no way of ascertaining. It is announced merely that the House has determined to accept one set of returns. By what vote the House has done that is not announced. The proposition of the Senator from New Jersey leaves that as a difficulty likely to impend, and does not undertake to remove it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is a mere matter of detail.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is a mere matter of detail.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It may very well happen that the vote may not be taken by yeas and nays, and it might happen that that vote would be taken so that those who voted for the proposition and who voted against it could not be ascertained. Suppose it was a simple vote in the ordinary way: "All who are in favor of this proposition say ay, and the contrary no." It would be out of the power of the presiding officer of the House or anybody there to say how the vote was. No body could tell who were the members who constituted the majority

Mr. RANDOLPH. Does the Senator from Virginia mean to say that upon a question of that magnitude it is probable or even possi ble that the vote shall be taken in the manner indicated by him; that so undignified a proceeding as that would be likely to occur

Mr. JOHNSTON. I cannot say that it is probable, but I do say Mr. JOHNSTON. I cannot say that it is probable, but I do say that it is possible; and, while we are providing against these contingencies, let us provide against all. Let us have this law passed so that there can be no trouble in the execution of it, and have the mode so clearly defined that it meets every conceivable emergency.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Then I will answer the Senator by saying that in providing for the details the law may state that the vote shall be

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is possible. The law might be framed in such a way as to provide for that; but, as it stands now, that difficulty exists, and, to my mind, it is a serious one.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Merrimon] has made a suggestion; and, as I am speaking on this subject, I may as well address myself to that as to the others. His proposition is to strike out all after the word "which," in section 2, line 7, and insert:

Shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities, recognized by and in harmony with the United States, as provided by the Constitution.

It seems to me that that amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is open to very serious objection. What is meant by being in harmony with the United States? Suppose we adopt that amendment and declare that that vote shall be counted which is certified by the authorities of the State in harmony with the United States, what does that mean? Does not that leave a wide field open for investigation and construction? What is the United States? The United States is the whole Government. It is the executive, the judicial, and the legislative departments of the Government. combined constitute the United States, and no two of them do it. It takes them all; and when we say that the government of a State is in harmony with the United States, I do not exactly understand the phrase or know how it will be interpreted. Take the existing state phrase or know how it will be interpreted. Take the existing state of things. The President belongs to the republican party; the Senate is republican; the House of Representatives is democratic; the Supreme Court and the judiciary are neither one nor the other, but are, as they ought to be, not politicians. Suppose the question should come up, whether or not a particular State government is in harmony with the United States, how is that fact to be ascertained? All mony with the United States, how is that fact to be ascertained? All the Departments of the Government are not "in harmony" with each other just now. There is a difference of opinion between the two Houses, the legislative branch; and a case might arise in which the government of a State could not be in harmony with the whole United States at the same time. A case might very well exist, too, where a State government had never been recognized by any Department of the United States. The elections come on in November. Most of the governors qualify in January. These returns are to be counted in February. No act of anybody, neither the legislative, executive, nor judicial branch of the Government, may have recognized the govern judicial branch of the Government, may have recognized the government of a State from the time of its inauguration up to the time of counting the electoral vote. I understand a recognition to mean some act of the legislative body recognizing a particular governor and a particular legislature as the legal government of a State, or through some proclamation of the President or some communication between him and them recognizing that as the legal government of the State. But the President cannot by general proclamation declare that a certain man is the governor of a particular State; that is not part of his duties. Neither can the Congress of the United States by law declare that a certain man is the governor of a State; that is no part of their constitutional power. All that either can do is, when a man claims to be the governor of a State, to recognize him in such intercourse as may take place between him and the United States or between him and a particular department of the Government in such manner as the Constitution and laws authorize States to have intercourse with that department. That is all we can do. We can only recognize him as governor when the occasion arises for the recognition. We cannot make a solemn recognition as an independent act. The recognition is the result of some intercourse between the two which requires that some act shall be done to bring it about. Until that is done there can be no recognition. It may very well beginned. that is done there can be no recognition. It may very well happen, therefore, that the State may not be in harmony with the United States. The State government may have never been recognized; and if the question of the returns comes up then, and it is to be tried by that standard, we have nothing to decide it by. That practical difficulty arises in regard to that proposition, and I think, therefore, that it is objectionable also.

I desire to say a few words in regard to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte.] I differ as widely from him as I can, both upon the construction of the authority be quotes from Kent's Commentaries and upon the construction he puts upon the Constitution and the report of the committee quoted by him. His idea is that Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries recognized the right and power of the President of the Senate to count the vote; that that was a duty under the Constitution, and that Congress had no right to legislate upon the subject. I think, with all due deference to the learned Senator, that he construed the authority wrongly. This is the law that he read:

In the case of questionable votes and a closely-contested election, this power may be all-important—

and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes, and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

Now I read that to mean this: There is a wide difference between constitutional provisions and legislative provisions. A constitutional provision is an amendment to the Constitution, a change in the organic law of the land. A legislative provision is an act of Congress, some proceeding of the two Houses in their legislative capacity. Chancellor Kent certainly knew the difference between a legislative and a constitutional proceeding; and when he used words intimating and a constitutional proceeding; and when he used words intimating that there might be a legislative provision on this subject, he certainly could not be held to have meant that the Constitution might be amended, and thus the difficulty avoided. We all know it is in the power of the country to amend the Constitution whenever three-fourths of the States agree to do so. There can be no question upon the right of amendments to the Constitution. He could not therefore have referred to amendments to the Constitution, nor could be have referred to any question connected with the Constitution itself, because certainly so learned and so accurate a man as Chancellor Kent knew the difference between the words constitutional and legislative, and he would not use the word "legislative" where he meant "constitutional." That any man, especially a learned law-writer, writing an elementary book for the regulation of the courts of the country and the instruction of the legal profession, should use words so loosely that he would not discriminate between the word "legislative" and the word "constitutional" is not to be supposed; and when he intimates, or says plainly, that there may be a legislative provision on the subject we understand him to mean that he thinks Congress has the right to pass a law on the subject, and by it to declare who shall count the votes. In that sense, if that view is true, he cannot be held to mean that the Constitution gives the Vice-President the right to count the votes, because if the Constitution did give that right then it could not hold that Congress could legislate on the subject. Whenever the right of Congress to legislate on the subject is conceded the right of the Vice-President under the Constitution to count the votes is denied. That proposition it seems to me is very plain. If the Constitution vested in the Vice-President the right to count the votes then no power can take it away from him; it belongs to him; he must exercise it; nobody else can. When Chancellor Kent says this is a subject upon which Congress may legislate, that Congress may provide who shall count these votes, of course his opinion is that the Vice-President has not the constitutional right to do it or that it is not vested exclusively in him.

I think that view is supported precisely by the report of the committee which was quoted by the learned and eloquent Senator from Maryland. It will be observed that the same body of men framed both the Constitution and the report. That was a report to the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, and, was adopted by that body. In construing the two instruments, therefore, if we find any difference in phraseology between them, what is the natural inference? It is not that the two mean the same thing, but that they mean different things. If the same hody of men make two that they mean different things. If the same body of men make two instruments, and if in making one they use particular language and in making the other they use other language in regard to the same subject, no rule of construction authorizes us to assume that the two instruments have the same meaning. The Constitution provided, as originally framed, in the second section of the second article, that the Vice-President should open the votes and they should then be counted; just as the twelfth article of the Constitution now provides. After the Constitution was constructed the report was made. The object of the report was merely to put in force the Constitution. We then had no President, no Vice-President. This report was in the nature had no President, no Vice-President. This report was in the nature of a schedule, such as accompanies all new State constitutions, specifying the means of putting it in operation, and nothing more. The Vice-President could not count the votes and determine who was regularly elected, because he did not then exist. Somebody had to do it. Therefore they had to provide some temporary expedient, and having provided first in the Constitution in general terms that the Vice-President should open the votes and that they should then be counted, they provide in this report for a special officer to be elected by the Senate, who should do—what?

That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the Constitution requires to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled.

That provision was changed afterward by directing the votes to be sent to the President of the Senate.

That the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

Now, then, that officer was elected for a single purpose. particularly deputed by this report to receive, to open, and to count the votes; but when you come to the Constitution itself it authorizes him to receive and open, and omits to direct that he shall count the him to receive and open, and omits to direct that he shall count the votes. Then what is the rule of construction by our courts? When this report provides that the Vice-President or the presiding officer shall receive, shall open, and shall count the votes, and the Constitution says that he shall receive and open them, by what rule of construction, I ask, is it that anybody can say that he shall also count the votes? The instrument itself upon its face would seem to me to determine it. When we recollect that it was made at the same time that this report was made, by the same body of men, and that these words that are important and material in the report are omitted in the Constitution; when we recollect that the Constitution specially the Constitution; when we recollect that the Constitution specially takes away from the Vice-President that particular power, I cannot understand how it is that any one can contend that the framers of the Constitution intended that it should give to that officer the right to count these votes. Every rule of construction and every court in the land would determine that the Constitution meant something different from the report because it omitted an important part of the report; that it meant something different because it used different language; that it could not mean the same thing when the two were so widely different in their terms. Therefore, I respectfully submit to the learned Senator that his argument is in default in that respect.

Upon reviewing all the propositions that have been made, I still insist that the amendment offered by myself, that, where there is a insist that the amendment offered by myself, that, where there is a disputed question in regard to a return, the two Houses together, voting by States, should decide it, is the one most in consonance with the Constitution and with the spirit of our institutions. It preserves the legitimate and constitutional weight of the States, and it is the only mode suggested that does. It presents the same features that the electoral college has, and it is the only provision that does it. It carries out just what the framers of the Constitution seemed to intend, and it is the only one that does it. It remits the decision of an important question to the two Houses acting in their capacity under the Constitution and acting in the way that the Constitution in the Constitution and acting in the way that the Constitution in-

It seems to me, therefore, with all due deference to the opinions of other Senators, that this proposition is the true solution of this question and should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOGY and Mr. HOWE. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of Mr. Cooper is to add to section 2 the following words:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid one.

It is proposed to amend this amendment by striking out all after the first word, "and," and in lieu thereof inserting the following:

If the Senate should vote for counting one certificate and the House of Representatives another, the joint meeting of the two Houses shall finally determine which shall be counted, by States, the representation from each State, including the Senators therefrom, having one vote; but if the representation of any State shall be equally divided, its vote shall not be counted.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire whether if this amendment be adopted it so adopted becomes the text, so as to be capable of amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and if adopted it will be still subject to amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. It can be superseded by another amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be open to amendment of course. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Davis, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Thurman, and Withers—11:

NAYS—Messrs. Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, West, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, English, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Wallace—23.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper;] which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the year and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS — Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, McDonald, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, and Withers—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christianey, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Key, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Paddewk, Robertson, Sargent, West, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—35.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, English, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Wallace—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAXEY. I handed in yesterday an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time. I believe this is the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no amendment pending; the bill is open to amendments.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer the amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported. The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to the second section the following:

But if the two Houses fail to agree as to which of the returns shall be counted, then the President of the Senate, as presiding officer of the two Houses, shall decide which is the true and valid return, and the same shall then be counted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the whole section as it will stand if amended be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read as it will stand if this amendment be agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return. But if the two Houses fail to agree as to which of the returns shall be counted, then the President of the Senate, as presiding officer of the two Houses, shall decide which is the true and valid return, and the same shall then be counted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have two objections to this amendment. The first is one perhaps of mere phraseology. It declares that "the President of the Senate, as presiding officer of the two Houses, shall decide." I do not think myself, under the Constitution, that any duty of the President of the Senate imposed upon him by the Constitution in respect of counting the votes is in the character of a presiding offi-cer of the two Houses, which implies a strict joint assembly, and logically to my mind would imply that the two Houses then and there assembled, as they frequently do in the States, as they do in my State, should act in a consolidated way and decide any question that might arise just as either House would alone. Therefore, phrased as the amendment is, I cannot vote for it for that reason, for I do not understand that the President of the Senate is the presiding officer of either House when he is performing that duty, in any legal and constitutional sense. That he sits in the chair, and that everybody keeps quiet, I agree; but in respect of it in a legal and constitutional sense I do not believe it at all. But of course it would be very easy to change that phraseology.

The objection that I have in substance to this amendment, and which to my mind is absolutely fatal, is that the President of the Senate may be, sometimes has been, and very likely often will be a candidate for President or for Vice-President himself, and this amendment proposes that that very person, selected by designation, shall, in a case of great doubt and dispute, when the two Houses acting with a patriotic disposition to follow the law and the Constitution are unable to agree, decide himself whether he shall be President or not. It appears to me that that would be a very unsafe and dangerous proposition. It is wrong in principle, as I think; and that it would be dangerous in the last degree in practice, I have no doubt at all.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I cannot support this amendment. In my judgment, after very considerable reflection, the duty of counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President is devolved upon the Senate and the House of Representatives as composing the Congress. My mind is not clear whether the two Houses when sitting in joint session should vote as one body or vote separately. At the last session I ventured to say that they should vote as one body. The inclination of my mind now is the other way; but be that as it may, the exclusive jurisdiction is in Congress, and I think so for reasons which I will not now detain the Senate to express. Entertaining that view, we have no power to delegate to the President of the Senate, or to the Supreme Court, or to commissioners, or to any tribunal whatsoever the right to decide any controverted question arising upon the count of the votes. It must be done by the Congress; by the Senate and House of Representatives. As I said, I will not detain the Senate now by assigning the reasons why I think so. I merely wish to say that I cannot support this amendment upon that ground

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I approach this question with a great deal of diffidence. It has been discussed by the best legal minds of the Senate and the best legal minds of the land; but I am well convinced that, if a constitutional mode could be adopted for perfecting the electoral returns before they come before the joint convention of the two Houses, it would be a desirable thing to do, and we should direct our efforts to bring that state of affairs about. There should be no bone of contention in the joint convention when it meets. The great danger is that there may be a difference of opinion there which might create such great discord as to endanger the peace of the country. Now, it does seem to me that it is within the province of the law-making power of the Government to impose upon the Supreme Court any duty which is reasonable and proper, just as Congress imposed on that court duties with reference to the appointment of registers in bank-ruptcy and the organization of bankrupt courts. These duties were quite outside of the specific duties of the Supreme Court under the Constitution, and it seems to me that all agents of this Government, whether Cabinet ministers, courts, or officers of any kind can have reasonable extra duties imposed upon them by Congress, which they are bound to perform or give up the positions they occupy.

Taking that view of the matter, it is clear to my mind that such leg-

Taking that view of the matter, it is clear to my mind that such legislation should be had here as to remove all doubt as to the prima facie legality, if I may so say, of these returns before they come to the joint convention. If the electors were made to meet, say, on the last Wednesday of November, instead of early in December, as the law now provides, and if the joint convention of the two Houses would meet, say, on the second Wednesday in February, instead of late in January, ample time would be given for an examination of these returns. I do not mean an examination of the matter inclosed in the envelopes, but an examination of the conditions under which the votes were east. If the electors were obliged by law to subscribe their names on the envelopes inclosing the returns, together with the date and hour of meeting and mode of procedure, then the returns when they reach the President of the Senate would show on their faces all necessary information to determine their legality or illegality.

If these returns could be submitted by the President of the Senate to the Supreme Court, either as a court or as a board of examination organized under a law of Congress for the purpose of examining the returns, the fact would develop itself at once if there were irregularities of procedure, or if two or more sets of returns had been forwarded from any one State. In the latter event the court or board of examination could send for witnesses and issue all necessary processes to determine which were the legal returns. After the necessary examination the legal returns could be certified back to the President of the Senate by the board of examination, and he would then be able to present to the joint convention at their meeting returns which on their faces would show themselves valid. Thus the intrusion of this bone of contention would be avoided.

There may be grave constitutional objections to this plan, but I can see no reason why the duty cannot be imposed upon the Supreme Court in some form. It seems to me an equitable way of arranging the matter, and one that would be acceptable to the people. The President of the Senate, in my opinion, could be authorized by Congress to part with these returns, for the time being, for the purpose of this examination.

It is gratifying to me, and must be to every Senator, to witness the spirit with which this question has been approached. There seems to have been no display of partisan feeling, and we should endeavor before we leave the subject to have it in such condition as to leave no ground for such a display at the meeting of the joint convention.

I merely throw out these remarks for consideration. I have drafted an amendment to the bill covering these points which at the proper an amendment to the bill covering these points which at the proper time I may offer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had not proposed to say anything upon this subject, but the amendment of the Senator from Texas is of a character that I think will be very dangerous in practice if it should be adopted. I only rise to say that I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from Texas. It proposes to confer in a certain contingency upon the presiding officer of this body the right to determine a question about which the two Houses of Congress are at disagreement. I think that would be a very dangerous power to place in the hands of any one man, however exalted his position, however pure his life and character. I would be unwilling to confer such a power, involving such consequences as would then probably arise, upon any one individual. Especially would I oppose the vesting of such great power in the Vice-President after there had been a disagreement between the two Houses of Congress upon the subject of which of two returns of the vote for President of the United States, certified from the same State, should be counted.

I fully realize the importance of the subject which has been brought to the attention of the Senate by the bill under consideration, and in the Committee on Privileges and Elections where it was under discussion I think the feeling very generally was that the question was one of vast importance and one which ought at least to be brought to the consideration and attention of Congress. The bill was reported from the committee for that purpose, with the distinct understanding that the respective members of that committee were not bound by the simple fact that the bill was reported to adhere to its provisions. I should have preferred the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and I voted for that most cordially as an amendment but it has been voted down.

Virginia, [Mr. Johnston,] and I voted for that most cordially as an amendment, but it has been voted down.

Now, there is no doubt but what there might possibly arise a contingency in the history of this country when, if we have nothing but the constitutional provision on this subject, great difficulty and embarrassment may result. I have listened to this debate; I have heard the views of Senators in reference to the true meaning of the constitutional provision in regard to the counting and ascertaining of the result of a presidential election; and I must confess that I widely differ from my learned friend from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] in his view of that subject. The constitutional provision is simply that the presiding officer of the Senate shall receive and open the votes. It does not say nor does it imply, in my opinion, that he shall count the votes.

In fact, the argument of the Senator from Virginia this morning showed that if any implication arises from the language of the Constitution and the practice at the first Congress, it is adverse to the conclusions of the Senator from Maryland, and the implication is the other way, that he shall not count. Mr. Langdon, the first presiding officer of this body under the Constitution, before its adoption, was specially required and authorized to count the votes by resolution of the Senate when no such authority was conferred upon the presiding officer of this body under the language of the Constitution. The presiding officer at that time, Mr. Langdon, was appointed to receive, to open, and to count the votes; but under the constitutional provision, the President of the Senate was only to receive and to open the votes. There is no express grant of authority in the Constitution to the President of the Senate to count the votes; and I apprehend that it would have been perfectly competent at any previous period in the history of this country for the Congress of the United States to have determined for themselves, in the absence of an express provision on the subject, who should count the votes, whether the President of the Senate, or the Speaker of the House, or persons appointed by their respective Houses. There is nothing in the Constitution to inhibit it, neither by express provision, nor, as I conceive, by implication

I am fully aware that the precedents which have been cited are entitled to some weight as authority, indicating at least what may have been considered the meaning, but they are not constitutional provisions. The practice has been, and the precedents establish the practice, that the presiding officer of this body counts when there is but one return; but those precedents do not incorporate any provision into the Constitution, and in the absence of such a provision, I maintain that it would have been competent, on any occasion when the vote for President was to be counted, for the respective Houses of Congress to have designated some other party than the President of the Senate to count the votes. I am not saying that the practice has not been a wise one. I am only saying that that practice has not the force and effect of constitutional provision, that it incorporates nothing into the Constitution that is not there, and that in the absence of any constitutional provision on the subject as to who shall count the votes, it was competent for Congress to provide some person other than the President of the Senate to have counted them, if in their wisdom they had seen proper so to do.

Now, the bill as reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections fails to provide for one contingency that may happen. I do not know that I have any serious objection to the bill except upon that ground, that it fails to provide for one contingency that may happen in the future history of this country, and that is that when two returns have been sent up from any State, and the two Houses of Congress are at disagreement in reference to which of those two returns are the true returns, then, if they cannot agree, but disagree, the vote of that State shall be thrown away. That such a contingency may arise is unquestionable, because it has arisen at one time, and at the very last presidential election such a contingency did arise, and the vote of Louisiana was cast aside.

Now, we ought not to leave this matter in that condition. The bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana does leave it in that condi-

Now, we ought not to leave this matter in that condition. The bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana does leave it in that condition, if there is no concord and agreement between the two Houses. The bill is defective in not further providing some rule by which the true returns from a State in that condition shall be counted. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia met the case, in my judgment, upon the true and proper ground; that was, to give to the two Houses of Congress, voting by States, the right and the power to determine that question. But that amendment has been voted down. And now an amendment is presented by the Senator from Texas that in that contingency—that is, upon the disagreement of the two Houses of Congress—the power shall be conferred on the presiding officer of this body. That, I say, would be conferring on him a most fearful power; and the exercise of that power on his part, I apprehend, would

It is not to be presumed that, if the two Houses of Congress disagree as to which of the returns in the case of double returns should be counted, there would be general acquiescence in the decision of the presiding officer of this body, and especially if his decision was cast in harmony with the views of his party on that subject. To avoid any such danger, to avoid the possibility of questioning the correctness of his action, I should be unwilling to see him placed in correctness of his action, I should be unwilling to see him placed in the possession of such authority. Nor do I believe that the presiding officer of this body has the right under the Constitution, as has been contended by some already, of judging when two returns are made which is the proper return. It is a case which was not contemplated by the Constitution, and for which no provision has been made; and if I could admit (which I do not admit) that the Constitution confers upon him now the power of counting the votes, that being a mere ministerial act, it does not confer upon him the power of judging as to which of two returns is the correct return; it does not deing as to which of two returns is the correct return; it does not devolve upon him the fearful power of deciding a question of that magnitude. Certainly it will not be contended that, when there are two returns presented to the presiding officer of this body where he must exercise judgment, where he must exercise discretion, the decision of that is the exercise of a ministerial act. It is a judicial act, to all intents and purposes.

The Senator from Maryland, if I understand him aright, contends that the power to count the votes is lodged in the President of the Senate, and is a ministerial act; but if he means to go so far as to say that any decision which he may render between different returns is a ministerial act, I differ entirely and essentially from his conclusion. Wherever there is the exercise of judgment required, wherever there is discretion involved, then the act ceases to be a ministerial act and becomes, not quasi-judicial, but judicial in fact. So then, if I were to admit that under the Constitution the President of the Senate is invested with authority and power, not only to receive and open the votes, but to count the votes, I do not admit that, when the question is presented of deciding between two sets of returns, he is invested with any authority under the Constitution of deciding which shall be counted. That being the case, I was in favor of some amendment to the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana which would meet that contingency. But nothing that I have seen yet fully meets with my approval except the amendment, which has been rejected, offered by the Senator from Virginia. It is true I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] as the next best proposition to meet the difficulty, but that likewise has been defeated. Now the proposition of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] is of such a character, investing the presiding officer of this MAXEY] is of such a character, investing the presiding officer of this body with such fearful power, that I am unwilling that that should become a part of this bill, preferring, if it is to pass, that it pass without any such amendment. I shall therefore vote against his amendment, and it was more for the purpose of announcing my determination to do so that I arose on this occasion than to enter into any general discussion upon the bill or the subject which it brings to the structure of the Seveta.

attention of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, some days ago in making some remarks on this subject, I expressed myself as favorable to such an amendment as that which has since been proposed by the Senator from Texas. On reflection, however, I became so impressed with the fact that our past history shows us that the President of the Senate, either on a re-election as Vice-President or as a candidate for President, is so likely to be interested in the result of the question which he may thus be called upon to decide, that I abandoned that proposition may thus be called upon to decide, that I abandoned that proposition and introduced an amendment, which is not perfect, but which has hitherto commanded the most votes, that the Speaker of the House of Representatives representing the popular branch, the President of the Senate representing the States, and the Chief Justice, the head of the judiciary, should be a tribunal to decide the question. That, I concluded, was the best tribunal we could have; a tribunal further removed from political influence than any other; and nuless some other amendment is adopted, when this bill passes into the Senate, I think I shall renew that proposition.

I simply rose to say that it seems to me the probability of the presiding officer of the Senate being interested in the question is a reason why I shall not vote for this amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I think it is a matter of regret that we cannot agree upon some plan for the decision of a question almost inevitable in the future, and where for the want of a decision the consequences are certain to be so grave. With what time and attention I have been able to give to studying the various amendments proposed, I have thought that the one proposed by the Senator from Texas was preferable to any other, although not entirely satisfactory. The Constitution contains in a single clause all power and all direction there is upon this matter.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It must either be done by the President of the Senate or by the two Houses. Certainly it is as fair to presume that by this provision of the Constitution it is as much intended that the duty of deciding which are the correct returns shall be devolved upon the President of the Senate as upon the two Houses. The proposition that the Houses, acting either separately or together, shall decide, has been already rejected; and the only portion of the Constitution which has any operative effect left for us to act upon is the first portion of it, which says that this duty, so far as the opening at any rate is concerned, shall devolve on the President of the Senate.

I am aware that the contingency may arise, has arisen before in our history, when the President of the Senate would be a candidate for President or perhaps for Vice-President, and his act might have the effect to either elect or defeat him and his party in his aspirations to that office. But I had rather, even with any temptation which might arise under that condition of things, leave it to the fair judg-ment of any man of sufficient character to be intrusted with the posi-tion of presiding officer of the Senate than to leave it to either House, or to both Houses, or to any tribunal where it will be determined simply upon party considerations. I suppose there is no doubt that a decision by States in the House of Representatives would be influenced almost wholly by questions of party, and adding the Senate to them would not change those considerations at all. If the Senate and the House should decide this matter sitting in joint convention, and the House should decide this matter sitting in joint convention, each Senator and each member having one vote, it would still be determined by mere party considerations; and I doubt if we are to expect in a decision so made the highest equity; but to any man occupying the position of presiding officer of the Senate, who should wrongfully, and obviously wrongfully, decide, whereby he became a gainer and attained high office, the office of President or Vice-President, such contempt would follow him during his term and during his whole life that I believe any one would shrink from encountering it. In this day of the rapid propagation of public opinion, of the facility this day of the rapid propagation of public opinion, of the facility for making known all facts, of sifting things to the bottom, any man who should fraudulently decide in favor of his own claims by wrong-fully declaring upon these returns, would place himself in a more unenviable position than that of Benedict Arnold, I might say even than that of Judas Iscariot; and it would be impossible for any man, under any temptation or for any office, even if he could hold it after such an act, to shield himself or to encounter contempt like that which would fall on his head from the whole American people and from the inhabitants of this globe. Therefore I believe that that in itself would be a safeguard for the purity of his act, and a very high

For this reason I am disposed, for one, to vote for this amendment and to lodge this power where it would seem that by some plausible interpretation of the Constitution the fathers intended that it should be lodged. There may be some difficulty in the wording of the amendment. Of course in the Senate, when this bill is reported, if the amendment shall be now adopted, the phraseology can be changed; but there is certainly the idea carried in the Constitution that the resident of the Senate is the presiding officer of the body:

The President of the Senate shell, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

There certainly is a body assembled, a joint convention made up of the two Houses, assembled for this limited purpose, and a person is the two Houses, assembled for this limited purpose, and a person is designated who is to act in their presence, and act in the way that a presiding officer ordinarily acts. Of course he is not here called distinctly the presiding officer of the body, but the inference is certainly carried by the language that he is to act in a certain capacity, and to a very large extent in that manner; and therefore the phraseology itself does not trouble me much, but I believe it can be corrected in that manner, and therefore the phraseology itself does not trouble me much, but I believe it can be corrected in that respect, and may conform perhaps more nearly to the language of the Constitution by leaving out the words "as presiding officer of the two Houses," and simply require this duty of him in the presence of the two Houses.

I give thus briefly my reasons for voting for this amendment. I think it is the best we have had.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must confess my surprise at the ground upon which my learned friend from California has placed his support of this amendment, touching a man's judging in his own case. If I understand him, his reason for being in favor of this amendment, so far as it respects that particular feature of it, is that, if a man were to judge erroneously, wrongly, in his own case in order to gain the election, if he were a candidate himself, he would be so followed by obloquy and moral perdition in this world that he would be restrained from doing it.

Mr. SARGENT. I spoke of corruption; not of an error in judgment. Errors of judgment we are all liable to; and so is any human

Mr. EDMUNDS. So we are; but I have always been taught to suppose that those people were least liable to errors of judgment who had no interest in the question to be decided. That is the very principle upon which, as I understand it, we nowhere in our polity, and nowhere in the polity of any civilized country, allow a man to be a judge in his own cause. It is not because any man who may happen to have a cause and be a judge is corrupt, or would mean to be corrupt if he decided his own cause; but it is because we know, as hurupt if he decided his own cause; but it is because we know, as human nature is, that no man in his own cause can generally be considered as impartial, that his mind is biased, and his intellect, therefore, is unable from the very nature of things to hold evenly and fairly the balance between opposing considerations or opposing facts. That I understand to be the principle upon which we do not allow people to act themselves where they themselves are concerned. That is the reason why we do not allow a Senator here to vote upon a measure in which he is directly and represently interested propositions. which he is directly and personally interested, peculiar to himself; not that if he did it we should expect that he was doing it from corrupt motives, if he decided in his own favor, but because we should expect that he was incapable, in the nature of things, of bringing to the consideration of that question a perfectly impartial mind.

Now, here you propose by a distinct affirmation of law that a person who may be, and who often is, and is likely often to be, the very person whose right to the office is in question, shall, in a case of the greatest doubt, when the two Houses disagree, and when the direction in which that doubt may be solved is to turn the scale, be the judge himself. Mr. President, it does not appear to me that that is sound in principle or safe in practice; quite the reverse. If there is any man who ought not to be authorized to exercise any judgment to determine a disputed question it is that man who is interested in it; and yet this amendment selects the very person who in our past history has sometimes been, and in our future history often will be, the person voted for as either President or Vice-President of the United States. I do not think, therefore, that the reasoning of my learned friend from California is well founded.

Mr. SARGENT. I might add another suggestion. This case, of course, is encompassed with difficulties. I presume that any one who addresses himself to it does it with some doubt, with some fear of the correctness of his own conclusions. I have endeavored to inform myself by the progress of this debate of the difficulties that were to be encountered, and to exercise such judgment as I could in arriving at a conclusion. At the same time I am aware that it is difficult for me, in the absence of light in the Constitution, and in view of such differences of opinion among those around me, to arrive at a conclusion in which I can have entire confidence; but I can suppose a case where if the presiding officer of the Senate was a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, nominated by any party or receiving Presidency of the United States, nominated by any party or receiving any electoral votes, and it became his duty under a law like this to open and decide upon the returns, he would retire from the office; he would resign; and then it would be in the power of the Senate to choose some person who would not have this disability.

I am not sure that if it was decided that the responsibility had better be concentrated upon a single individual of high character rather than be diffused through a body where responsibility is entirely lost, so many partaking of it, and it becomes merely conventional and party, the law might not require that the presiding officer of the Senate should vacate his office if he became a candidate for President of the United States, or rather in case any electoral votes of the Senate should vacate his office if he became a candidate for President of the United States, or rather in case any electoral votes should be cast for him. That certainly would remove the difficulty. Then the presiding officer of the Senate does not pass upon a question the result of which is to give him either the Presidency or Vice-Presidency of the United States. I would suggest that to my friend from Vermont as entirely obviating the objection which he makes to the amendment. That is to say, the amendment might be so framed that in case the presiding officer shall receive electoral votes from any State in the Union he shall retire from his office and the Senate shall select a presiding officer whose duty it shall be to open the returns. returns

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you get the constitutional power to do

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I was impressed, when the question was first mooted of the necessity for an amendment to this second section, that some plan should be devised to avoid or prevent what it was said would inevitably follow in case of a disagreement between the two Houses, that a State might be disfranchised. I then turned over in my own mind what plan would be better, which of the several amendments that have been suggested it would be better to adopt in order to meet the contingency that might arise. The more I have reflected upon the subject, the more I have been brought to the opinion that I believe it to be better and safer and more logical to leave the bill as it stands.

I confess that so far as the amendment under consideration is concerned, it strikes me of all others as being the most objectionable. certainly cannot agree to the reasoning or argument presented by the Senator from California. It occurs to me that if that argument be sound, then upon the same principle it were better and safer in all cases to make a man judge in his own case, because that high sense of honor which the Senator presumes would obtain in the person who is to decide this question would necessarily keep him in the right path. All experience demonstrates this one thing, it seems to me, as conclusively as anything else that can be demonstrated, that we know less of the strength of our own prejudices than of anything on earth; and there is no one thing upon which we are such unsafe judges as when we come to determine how strong our prejudices or feelings or interests may be on a given question. If self in any instance this wavering balance shakes, it is rarely if ever right adjusted. We wavering balance shakes, it is rarely if ever right adjusted. We may think it is, but it is inevitably true that it is not right adjusted. Now take the proposed amendment; however much may be the interest, however much may be involved in the question, personally or otherwise, to the person who has to decide it, he may attempt to divest himself of all prejudice and all feeling and all interest, and yet, all unconsciously it may be, he is thus influenced. It is dangerous for that reason to intrust him with the determination of that question. There can be but one reason, it seems to me, in logic for leaving this question to the presiding officer, and that is by reason of his relations to the two bodies. There is argument in favor of that by reason of his relation, rather than leave it to an outside tribunal; and yet it seems to me that that reason is more than overcome by his possible, and in many instances his actual, relation to the question; and for that reason, without mentioning others, it seems to me that the argument against intrusting the power of deciding the question to him is all-conclusive.

Now, suppose the presiding officer shall not be the person, then it is proposed either that the judges of the Supreme Court, not as a court, shall be selected as the tribunal to which this question shall be left. Another proposition is that it shall be left to three persons perhaps—the presiding officers of the two Houses and the Chief Justice of the United States; and other tribunals have been named. It occurs to me that it is illogical, and in the face of the very theory of our system of government, the nature and duties and obligations in-posed upon the legislative department of the Government, that an outside tribunal shall be selected as umpire. It seems to me to be just as logical that in a case where the two Houses are unable to agree upon a bill, upon a joint resolution, or any other measure, you shall provide that an umpire shall be called in to settle this difference. If the presiding officer of the Senate can be trusted by reason of that sense of duty that he feels is imposed upon him, and that fear of public condemnation, then why not the two Houses of Congress? Each and every member of either House must be impressed just as much as he would be, and comes to the discharge of the duty impressed with the solemn obligations that are upon him. Now, when the two Houses, acting honestly, faithfully, with a sincere desire to arrive at what is right, as we must presume they are thus impressed, are unable to determine, why not there leave the question, and why seek for an outside tribunal to settle this question that they are unable to determine, a question that they have struggled to settle honestly and

It is said that it is unfair and that it is unjust to a State that its electoral vote shall be rejected, and that unless you provide some tribunal it may occur, the two Houses disagreeing, that the vote cannot be counted. Now suppose that shall occur. It occurs after an thousest and faithful effort on the part of the two Housest oagree. The two Houses have attempted to agree upon a bill and it fails; and the two Houses have attempted to agree upon this question and they fail. I think it would rarely occur that the question could be presented in such a form that the two Houses could not agree; but if it should occur, it results from mismanagement, corrupt, captious, unfair, unfaithful, conduct on the part of the officials of a State, because persons representing the State have sent up their returns in such a form that the two Houses, acting in good faith and under their sworn obligations, are unable to determine what shall be done. If in such an event a State shall not have its vote, it occurs to me it is only one of those cases where, whether by reason of the mismanagement of the State or by reason of the inability of the two Houses to agree after the most faithful action or both together, the State fails to have its vote, it may be a misfortune, but it is only another instance of those that frequently occur in legislation or in the administration of our affairs where there is loss, and it were better and safer that the loss should occur, perhaps, than to attempt to encourage any doubtful legislation or to provide a tribunal or method of settling it that is doubtful and questionable, to say the least of it.

I therefore have reached the conclusion that I shall vote for the bill as it stands, so far as this section is concerned. I am opposed to the present amendment. I am opposed to the erection of any tribuoutside of the two bodies to come in and assist in this question. I think the two Houses ought to count the vote, and if they are unable to agree where there are two returns, then if it occurs that the vote of the State is lost it results after the most faithful, deliberate, and conscientious action, as I am bound to suppose, on the part of the two bodies. If then they are unable to agree, we have a case that is not provided for and that we cannot safely provide for, perhaps, as the Constitution stands.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, my difficulty with this amendment is that it derives its whole authority from a statute. A statute of the United States in this amendment devolves upon the President of the Senato, or, in the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, upon three persons designated, or, in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, upon the members of the Supreme Court—a statute devolves upon them the designation of a President of the United States for four ars. Their authority is derived solely from a statute of the United States, for nowhere in the Constitution of the United States is the idea broached that upon any individual in the United States shall be devolved the power of selecting the President of the United States He who decides this question designates a President of the United States, and he gets his authority from this statute and nowhere else. Whether the President of the Senate could be trusted, or whether the gentlemen selected in the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey could be, or those high characters who consti-tute the Supreme Court of the United States, (which is, in my opin-ion, the best of all the amendments,) it is enough to my mind that they have no other authority to designate a President of the United States than that which they derive from this statute; and that while the Constitution of the United States took what its framers thought was all necessary pains at that time to guard and secure the selection by the people of a President, it has been left to us here to discuss the question whether by a statute we cannot safely designate a man or men who will select for us a President of the United States. Sir, that is such a departure from the Constitution that I cannot vote for it. If there were no other objection, it is a power reposed in one man or in ten men, however high their character, that it would not be safe It is in violation of all the analogies and all the theories upon which the Government itself is based, and it would be the strangest anomaly in what would otherwise be called a free government of the people, that although in all things else the nation and the Constitution had studied to give effect to the voice of the people, we had here deliberately, by a short section of three lines, selected a man and clothed him with the power of saying who shall be the President of the United States.

It may be but the best way out of a difficulty, which I admit (as the Senator from Indiana has over and over again impressed upon the Senate) may exist; but because it exists, it does not authorize us without authority of the Constitution itself to clothe any man with this authority. I agree with what has just been said that while the Constitution does clothe these two Houses with power, if they fail to agree, the legal effect of it—if you do not put it into the bill—the consequence of their failing to agree is just what you have written out in this bill, nothing more. If a question arises, about the opening of a vote, whether you shall count it or not, and those on whom the Constitution has devolved the duty of deciding it fail to agree, the legal consequence is precisely what this bill says shall be the consequence. It cannot be counted, because those upon whom the Constitution has devolved the power of determining it have failed to agree that it shall be counted, or how it shall be counted. And because they fail to agree, and because the Constitution has not gone because they fail to agree, and because the Constitution has not gone further to dispose of the question, we propose to do so by a statute. The ingenuity of members of the Senate and the House may be exhausted upon selecting the best and the safest tribunal; but still it will lack constitutional authority, and, lacking constitutional authority, it is naught and being naught to set up a man as President of the United States without authority is another definition of usurpation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I cannot agree with my friend from Massachusetts that these amendments, or any of them, look to defeating the will of the people and that this upports this look to defeating the will of the people, and that this umpire, this tribunal, designates who is to be the President. The people who have voted, the electoral colleges, the States whose votes have been counted, have all had much to say as to who shall be President, and the object of these amendments, one and all, is not to defeat the will of the people, but to prevent the will of the people being defeated. It is in the event of there being two returns that we wish to have a tri-bunal to select the true one, because we believe that the Constitution contemplated that in that event the vote of each State should be counted. So it seems to me that these amendments cannot be characterized as usurping the rights of the people.

Again, I cannot agree with my friend in his proposition that these amendments have nothing to rest upon excepting statute; that they have not a constitutional basis. Of course if they have not a constitutional basis, that is fatal to them. But I understand that when the Constitution says that "the votes shall then be counted," a duty is devolved upon the legislative branch of the Government. We are not told by the Constitution how we shall discharge that duty; and according to all the analogies of the Constitution, where any subject is devolved upon a legislative department of the Government and we are not told how we are to discharge the duty, we do it by legisla-tion; we are authorized so to do by the Constitution. The Constitution says that there shall be courts inferior to the Supreme Court. We go on and organize them. So here it says these votes shall be counted. We go on by legislation and say how they shall be counted. There is a difficulty in finding a tribunal upon whom we have a right to impose the duty against their will. This is a difficulty perhaps which would exist in reference to making the judges of the Supreme Court, not as a court, but as individuals, the tribunal in this case. If it is a new office created, they may accept it or not as they please; and that is the only difficulty that I see in our arriving at a perfectly satisfactory amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Of course the Senator from New Jersey knows that

I did not mean to say that these amendments were designed to defeat the will of the people; but the amendments may have that result, in-asmuch as the will of the people cannot be expressed by both of the certificates, and must be expressed through one or the other, and you clothe an individual with power to say which of those two. One of them expresses the will of the people, and the other defeats the will of the people. You give him the power to select between the two, and you give him the power to pervert the will of the people. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do every judge in all cases.

Mr. DAWES. I know it; and therefore the Constitution thought it not wise to leave the question to one individual. If the meaning of the Constitution is that the votes shall be counted in such manner as the two Houses shall prescribe, it would be competent by legislation to prescribe a method for counting; but I have not understood any one, and certainly do not myself understand the meaning of the Constitution to be, that the votes shall be counted in such manner as the two Houses may by law prescribe, but they shall be opened by the presiding officer in the presence of the two Houses as Houses, not as members of the Houses, and that they shall then be counted. I have understood all to agree that that means they shall be counted then understood all to agree that that means they shall be counted then, when they are in that presence, either by the President of the Senate, or by the two Houses, or by the joint action of the two Houses. If it is to be done by either, then it cannot be done by anybody alse.

I do not know how that could be made clearer. If it is to be done by the President of the Senate, if that is the construction, in the presence of the two Houses, then it cannot be done by anybody else; and the attempt to clothe any other tribunal with the power to count the votes is to depart from that provision. If that provision of the Constitution means that it is to be done by the two Houses, then it cannot be done by anybody else, and the two Houses cannot devolve that trust on anybody else, nor can any law clothe anybody else with the power. That is my difficulty as well as objection, that it would not be safe to trust the President of the Senate with it, it would not be safe to trust any individual with it, it would not be safe to trust ten men picked out of the Senate of the United States with it, because underneath the point to be decided lie questions of fact growing out of the corruption and fraud and passion and disorganization and demoralization in a State, which has so weakened and perverted its government that the State cannot make manifest who are the men it has appointed to be electors. There is the difficulty; there it lies; and nothing will remedy it that does not reach that. Least of all will it remedy it for us to undertake to find an outside tribunal and clothe it by force of law with this extraordinary power.

May I ask the Senator from New Jersey where in the Constitution he gets the idea that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the Iouse and the Chief Justice of the United States shall be a tribunal to count these votes by determining which of the two votes shall be counted, for that is equivalent to counting them? I do not mean to criticise the propriety of such a tribunal if it were within the power of the Constitution, though I say that, of all tribunals outside, the judges of the Supreme Court are the best, because there is, thank God, still a reverence for the judges of the Supreme Court and the court itself and its judgments.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no objection to stating to my friend that I certainly do not find it written in the Constitution that the presiding officers of the two Houses and the Chief Justice shall be a tribunal; but I do find it written in the Constitution, mandatory upon us, that we shall see that the vote is counted, without telling us how the vote is to be counted, and thereby imposing upon us as legislators the duty, I think, to make provision that it shall be as legislators the duty, I think, to make provision that it shall be fairly and justly counted.

Mr. DAWES. Then I understand the reading of the Constitution by the Senator from New Jersey to be that when the votes are to be counted, the "then" in the Constitution (which is a time fixed, and that time is when the President of the Senate is in the presence of the two Houses, the Senate and House of Representatives, and "then" they must be counted) means that we can provide by law that in some other presence, before some other tribunal, it shall be determined how the Senate and House shall count the votes

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend does not exactly get it yet. I think that the vote has got to be counted in the presence of the Houses. But like the cooking of a fish—you must catch it first. So you must know what you are going to count before "the votes" can "then be counted."

then be counted."

Mr. DAWES. In other words, if there are two certificates coming up from the State of Massachusetts, one having 13 votes for John Smith and the other having 13 votes for William Wilkins, and if the Smith and the other having 13 votes for William Wilkins, and if the two Houses, clothed with the power of counting the votes, cannot determine whether 13 votes shall be counted for John Smith or 13 votes for the other man, we refer it to a tribunal to determine which of them shall be counted, and then that judgment of the tribunal is binding upon the two Houses, and that is equivalent to the two Houses counting them! I do not so understand it. I think if this tribunal determine which 13 shall be counted, they have counted them. They have determined the fact; they have to all intents and purposes counted them, and it is not the two Houses that count them after that. It is the two Houses that record the judgment of this tribunal, to wit, that 13 more shall be added to John Smith instead of William Wilkins. That is not counting the votes by the two Houses. That is trifling with the question. Somebody else counts those votes, and I do not find that somebody else in the Constitution.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I cannot understand myself what difference, except in one point of view, it makes whom you select to decide the controversy that you have in comtemplation. If the Legislature has authority to name a tribunal to decide that controversy at that time, it does not make much difference who composes the tribunal, except in one point of view. If you want a republican decision, you had better frame your law so as to be sure of having a republican tribunal, and if you want a democratic decision, you had better take care to frame your law so that you have a democratic tribunal. You see the controversy is a very peculiar one that you are trying to have decided. It is a controversy upon which hangs the title to the highest decided. It is a controversy upon which hangs the title to the highest office under our Constitution, the highest office in the world, and it is a controversy to which all the people of the United States are parties on the one side or the other. It is a controversy so difficult of solution, a controversy the facts or the law concerning which are so involved, that, having been submitted to the House of Representatives and to the Senate separately, they have disagreed about it and do not come to the same conclusion. One thinks the right is one way and the other thinks the right is the other way. That is the sort of controversy. Now you want to pick out a man who shall say off-hand what shall be done with that question. Take a blind man, take a fool, take a sage, it will happen, whoever you take, that if he is a republican he will count the republican vote; if he is a democrat he will count the democratic vote. I take it there is not much doubt about that. I do not mean to impugn any man's good faith or his honesty when I say that. You call upon him to do a thing with only so much light before him as has led all the rest of the world to stumble. He finds every republican in the United States on one side of that controversy. He finds every democrat in the United States on the other side of it. He finds one House of Congress on one side of it and one House on the other side

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose we appointed an independent power? Mr. HOWE. No matter how independent he is, what means has he within his reach of determining that question with anything like precision and accuracy? What you want is not a tribunal but a form of procedure, it seems to me. The law will not allow the title to a horse to be disposed of finally and conclusively without a form of procedure before a judicial tribunal, where evidence is heard from the mouths of sworn witnesses, witnesses who are examined and cross-examined, and where every point of law is settled by one learned in jurisprudence. When you have obtained a judgment in such a tri-bunal, then you allow the title to that horse to be disposed of, con-You know then who owns the horse; nobody in the world can dispute it. But here the gravest controversy in the world we suppose is going to be settled by a man or a tribunal who cannot swear a witwho cannot read a newspaper, who cannot have a deposition read before it, who cannot have an argument. Off-hand, from what he happens to know or to have heard, he is to pronounce upon the title to the Presidency of the United States, or to pronounce upon a fact which settles the Presidency.

I have voted against all these amendments. I shall vote against this amendment for the double reason, first, that I do not think in the Congress of the United States lies the authority to create any such tribunal; and, secondly, if it had power to legislate such a tribunal into being, I think we might get a better one than either that has been named yet, or at all events we might provide a better form of trial for any one of these tribunals than we yet have provided.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is a rule that ought never to be departed from in law, that nobody shall be called upon to decide a question who has any interest in the result, and that no one shall be a judge in his own case; yet the amendment of the Senator from Texas gives a decision on one of the most important questions that ever arose to the very man in all the United States most likely to have an interest in the man in all the Child States most likely to have an interest in the result—the presiding officer of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I did intend to say a word when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] sat down, but I did not get the floor then. I may perhaps as well say now what probably I would have said then. While the Senator from Wisconsin said justly that men generally vote according to their prejudices and vote with their party and with their friends, yet it often happens that they do go with their consciences in preference to their friends. I believe a case might be found where the presiding officer of this body, although interested himself in the decision of this question, would vote with his adversa-nimself in the decision of this question, would vote with his adversaries. I might bring to the Senator's mind by way of illustration a case which occurred here only a little while ago, when several Senators on this side of the House gave the doubt to their adversaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We gave the certainty to our adversaries.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly not one of them would have done anything but what he believed to be right; but in the case of Pinchback, the presumed Senator from Louisiana, the doubts were given by enough of our friends on this side to deprive him of his seat. So I believe as men acted upon that occasion according to their consciences, men in the future will be found here in nim of his seat. So I believe as men acted upon that occasion according to their consciences, men in the future will be found here in this body who will act according to their consciences. I believe it is always right to give the doubts to your friends, personally or politically, but I am sure a good man will always act according to his conscience, no matter what the responsibility may be, no matter how great his personal interest may be in the decision.

Mr. Maxey. I presented this amendment because I believe it was

Mr. MAXEY. I presented this amendment because I believe it was Mr. MAXEY. I presented this amendment because I believe it was a constitutional solution of a very difficult problem. I did it believing, as I yet believe, that the mode provided is sustained by the Constitution. I do not propose to review one solitary argument that I made yesterday, nor to change anything I then said. I do not care, however, that the record of to-day's proceedings shall go forth to the world with the remark of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] without some answer to it.

Upon what authority of the Constitution, upon what authority of the law, does he assume that in giving the settlement of the question to the Vice-President of the United States, presiding over the Senate, he is giving it to that man most of all others interested in the settlement of the question? If he be the old Vice-President and the count is of a newly-elected ticket, he goes out with that vote. He therefore does not count himself in, because he goes out of office with the coming in of the new President and Vice-President. It rests upon the assumption that the Vice-President is necessarily a candidate for re-election or a candidate for President. It is assuming that because a man happens to be Vice-President he necessarily must be a candidate for re-election or a candidate for President. I only have this to say in reply to that: Under the Constitution of our common country any man having the constitutional requisites has just as much right to be a candidate for the office of President or Vice-President as the Vice-President or presiding officer of the Senate; so that the reason amounts to nothing. It is assuming that which is not necessarily true. It may be so or it may not be so. The same reason will apply to any tribunal whatever that might be selected for the settlement of this question, because every man has the same right if he has the constitutional qualification. It is a surpassing strange thing to me that gentlemen should object to reposing this trust in the Vice-President at this late day and hour, after the Government has followed it from its organization down to the year 1869.

Mr. MERRIMON. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Mr. MERRIMON. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five.
Mr. MAXEY. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five was the time of the passage of the twenty-second joint rule, but I believe the election which took place in November, 1868, was the first election held under the joint rule of February, 1865. Up to the year 1869, according to the authorities, the Vice-President, or President of the Senate, had always counted the vote; and yet gentlemen pretend now that this power is so dangerous that of all men'in America the last man to intrust with it is the President of the Senate. They speak of it as something strange, and yet if I remember history correctly, at the very time of the contested election between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Burr, the most excited race that ever was run in the United States. Burr, the most excited race that ever was run in the United States, requiring thirty-six ballots to settle the question, Mr. Jefferson himrequiring thirty-six ballots to settle the question, Mr. Jefferson himself was Vice-President. I appeal to gentlemen if it is not a correct statement of history that at that time Mr. Jefferson was Vice-President of the United States, having been elected under Mr. Adams at the time he was elected President, following General Washington's election. Over and over again the Vice-President has presided when he himself was either a candidate for re-election or for President; and yet during all that long period of our history we have never had one man in America who was so low, so utterly lost to every sense of honor, and justice, and of propriety, that we should have to leave, when we came to arrange the pictures of the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of this great and glorious Union of ours, one single niche covered with a black pall, as one in the palace of the Doge of Venice. No man yet in this country has betrayed that great trust, notwithstanding the fact that on every occasion up to the year 1868 this vote was counted by that on every occasion up to the year 1868 this vote was counted by the Vice-President. It does seem to me, when that remark is made, it is prostituting into the very dust the character of the men whom the people of this broad land of ours have thought fit to vote for as President and Vice-President of the United States. Are the people of this country so lost to honor, so lost to integrity, that they themselves would select a man to run for one of these high offices who was so corrupt, so steeped in moral iniquity, that he would count himself into office against the will of the people? I do not believe it. I have a higher regard for the character of the American people. I have a higher regard for the men whom the American people. I have a higher regard for the men whom the American people have brought to the front. The position will not do. It is degrading our own people and degrading the men whom our people have vested with high trusts.

When is it, under the amendment that I had the honor to offer, When is it, under the amendment that I had the honor to offer, that the Vice-President has the power to decide? Never when there is but one certificate of election, because if both Houses reject the certificate it goes out, and if one House goes one way and the other House goes the other way, it is counted. When there are two certificates, and both Houses agree upon one of the certificates, it is counted. When, then, does this great power of the Vice-President come in? It is only when every effort has been made, and the two Houses cannot agree. In that case you have got to do one of two things. If you reject the vote of the State, you may put a man in the presidential office who has not, as the Constitution requires, received a majority of the electoral votes of the people: for if you throw a vote a majority of the electoral votes of the people; for if you throw a vote aside, who can say that the man who is put in the presidential chair has the majority of the votes of the people? Our Constitution requires all the votes to be cast. If this great power has been intrusted to the Vice-President from the election of General Washington down to the last election of Mr. Lincoln, and never on a single occasion has he betrayed his trust notwithstanding that he was a candidate, I ask why, when only in one single state of the case power is to be intrusted to him, has he become so dangerons? Have the people of America been so forgetful of their duty in selecting good men and true as to put a man there who would betray the trust that was given him? That would be worse than murder itself. I do not believe it.

I admit, as has been stated often here, that this is a dangerous and a difficult problem. We must believe that there are some honest men in this world. While rumors are afloat all over the land of high orimes and misdemeanors committed by men in high places, while men have covered themselves from the crown of the head to the sole of their feet with infamy and with crime, and have fallen from their high position, yet I thank God He has put it into my heart not to believe that all men are dishonest and that I yet have confidence in man. I yet believe that the American people have the intelligence to put in position, whatever may be their politics, men of integrity, men who want to do right. I believe that the two Houses of Congress will want to do right; but, when the question comes up before them, honest men may differ. One of the two Houses may decide this question in one way and the other House in the other way. If the matter is left to stand at that point, the vote of a State may unquestionably be lost. By the very losing of that vote a man may be placed in the presidential chair who had not a majority of the electoral votes by the people, as required by the Constitution.

The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the vote shall then be counted.

Not part of that vote shall be counted, but all of it. He who desires to stick to the Constitution as closely as I hope I do wants to see it carried out in its letter and in its spirit. The letter and spirit of the Constitution are that the votes contained in every valid certificate must be counted then and there and by the authority which the Constitution has pointed out for that high duty; that high trust, I will say, because I regard it as a sacred trust. So believing, I cannot conceive that the position which has been assumed here is tenable, unless you hold out the banner and write upon it in the face of all mankind that we have no confidence in man, that we believe that mankind that we have no confidence in man, that we believe that any man who is exalted to a high position will so far forget himself, his oath, his honor, the confidence which the people have placed in him, that he will prostitute all these, and, like Judas Iscariot, sell his master for a price. I do not believe that, and therefore I say that in some stage of this proceeding, if we wish to carry out the will of the people, we must trust somebody. I am willing to trust the man that the Constitution trusts, according to my construction of the Constitution, with the best lights before me. For that reason I have offered this sympathment not that it is a part measure with me for I have none this amendment, not that it is a pet measure with me, for I have none. this amendment, not that it is a pet measure with me, for I have none. I have done what other gentlemen here say they have been doing: I have been seeking light. If any Senator on this floor will point out a better and clearer plan than the one I have suggested, one that more thoroughly carries out the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, I will adopt his plan. All that I want to do is to secure to the States of this American Union their right beyond peradventure to have their vote counted in the election of President and Vice-President. dent of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to the Senator from Texas to make a correction in his amendment by blotting out the words "as presiding officer of the two Houses."

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that my attention was called to that by the Senator from Vermont. I think the expression "President of the Senator" is sufficient, and that the words "as presiding officer of the two Houses" are unnecessary. I ask that that modification be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has that right. The Senator from Texas modifies his amendment, and the Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the second section of the bill the following:

But if the two Houses fail to agree as to which of the returns shall be counted, then the President of the Senate shall decide which is the true and valid return, and the same shall then be counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, whom I do not see in his seat, [Mr. WINDOM.] I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. WEST, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.] who would vote against the amendment, and I, if at liberty, would vote for it

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll; which resulted—yeas 7, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Hamlin, Maxey, Robertson, Sargent, and Withers—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Authony, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christianey, Conkling, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon. Hamilton, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Sharon, Whyte, and Wright—38.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bruce, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dorsey, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kernan, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, and Windom—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This question is so important and the discussions of it have been so interesting, as they really have, that I think further reflection upon the subject will be useful to the public interest; and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I should be glad to continue the consideration of this bill awhile longer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go over till to-morrow; we are not losing

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

STEAM FOG-SIGNAL AT MACKINAW.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 957) to appropriate money for the erection of a station and steam fog-signal at Mackinaw, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONTRACTS FOR SERVILE LABOR.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2802) to prohibit contracts for servile labor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the following petitions, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same; and they were referred to the Committee of Claims:

The petition of H. G. Belding, of Minnesota, for relief for carrying mails between 1858 and 1862; and

The petition of Jeremiah Darling, asking pay for carrying United States mails over route No. 9497.

RELIEF OF STATE OF KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2813) relieving the State of Kansas from charges on account of ordnance stores furnished to Kansas Territory; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DATE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. RICE. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom were referred House bills Nos. 316, 394, 463, and 1162, to report as a substitute therefor a bill (H. R. No. 2803) to provide that all pensions on account of death, wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States since March 4, 1861, which have been granted or which shall hereafter be granted upon applications filed previous to January 1, 1880, shall commence from the date of death or discharge, and for payment of arrears of pensions—which was read a first and second time and referred to the committee, and to ask that the bill, with the accompanying report, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the consideration of the same be assigned to Tuesday of week after next.

The SPEAKER. There is already one special order for that day.

Mr. RUSK. Then say Wednesday.

Mr. RICE. I will say a week from next Wednesday; two weeks from to-day. Mr. HALE.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will except business of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RICE. I agree to make that exception; and ask that the bill be considered from day to day, with that exception, until disposed of. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to making the order requested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. RICE?]

There was no objection, and the order was made.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee of Accounts. I send it to the desk to be

At a regular meeting of the Committee of Accounts, held Wednesday, March 15, at eleven o'clock a.m., the two committees mentioned herein were allowed one clerk jointly, to wit: the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812, and the compensation fixed at $4 per diem from the 1st day of March, 1876.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I ask concurrence in that report.
Mr. HOLMAN. I object. I do not mean that I object to the subject coming before the House for consideration; I merely wish to vote against the report. I think we are increasing the number of clerks unnecessarily.

The question being taken, the report was concurred in.
Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I desire to present another report from the Committee of Accounts, and send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred a resolution of the Committee on the Investigation into Affairs of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, to allow the clerk of said committee $5 per diem, made a report on the 9th day of March allowing $4 per diem; and since that report was made, the chairman of said committee having represented to a portion of the committee the immense amount of labor performed by the said clerk, the majority of the said Committee of Accounts have instructed the chairman to report that said clerk be allowed $5 per diem instead of $4, as heretofore allowed, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

*Resolved,* That the clerk to the Committee on the Investigation of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company be allowed $5 per day, instead of $4, as heretofore allowed, to commence from the date of his taking the eath of office.

The question being taken, the resolution reported by the Committee of Accounts was adopted.

HARRIET C. DUNHAM.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2804) granting a pension to Harriet C. Dunham, widow of Charles A. Dunham, late private Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARTHA L. REAMS.

Mr. McFARLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2805) restoring the name of Martha L. Reams to the pension-roll as the widow of William B. Reams, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BARBARA CHENOWITH.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2806) for the relief of Barbara Chenowith; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2558) for the benefit of A. L. Shotwell, of Jefferson County, Kentucky, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

RICHARD H. FOUTS.

Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2807) for the relief of Richard H. Fouts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. SLEMONS, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the bill to re-imburse H. R. Belding, of Minnesota, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims

ENLARGEMENT OF THE SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, presented a petition from the Chamber of Commerce, Cotton Exchange, and city government of Memphis, Tennessee, to have the Signal Service enlarged; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assem-

Your memorialists, representing in their business and commercial capacity that section of country embraced within the limits of West Tennessee, North Mississippi, North Alabama, and Eastern Arkansas, respectfully show to your honorable bodies—

section of country emoraced within the limits of west tennessee, North Massissippi, North Alabama, and Eastern Arkansas, respectfully show to your honorable bodies—

That, since the establishment of the Signal Service Department of the United States Army, in the year 1871, the above-described districts have been made to realize, in a most forcible and convincing way, the great benefits conferred upon the country at large, and particularly upon these districts, by the investigations have been of signal advantage and benefits to these districts, both through the system of river reports, showing the probable changes in the Mississippi River, so extremely important to the agricultural, commercial, and river transportation interests of our community, and the valuable tabulated statements of heat and cold, frosts, rain-fall, storms, and other matter, so important in their bearing upon the agricultural interests of the whole country as affording valuable data in estimating the total agricultural productions of the States; yet, as at present distributed to the people, the system of daily weather bulletins reaches but a small portion of the populace, especially in the interior districts, while the limited number of reports from the many stations where the meterological observations are taken accorded to these districts, and especially to Memphis-their great central point of distribution—goes far to defeat the purpose of the law creating the Signal Service Department, at least as far as its benefits to these immediate districts are concerned.

We respectfully represent that to no community favored with the Signal Service bulletins could they be made so valuable as to the above-enumerated sections, situated as they are within the northern cotton belt, and dependent almost exclusively for their very existence upon the cultivation of that most sensitive of shrubs, the cotton plant, which is peculiarly affected in these northern regions by the varying extremes of heat and cold, rain-fall, and drought; and, developing an exte more powerful and self-evident than those urged by any other section of the United States.

But we fully realize that, with the present appropriation at the disposal of the Chief Signal Officer, the demands of our community and the adjacent country for an increased amount of meterological information, so important to our agricultural interests, cannot be granted, nor can the information under present conditions be disseminated to any valuable extent, so far as these immensely important planting and agricultural interests are concerned.

We therefore pray that the appropriation for this Department, at present so incommensurate with its important and intrinsic value, be increased to such sum as the great experience of the Chief of the Department may determine to be necessary for its working in the manner originally contemplated by the law creating it.

J. T. PETTET.

President Chamber Commerce.

J. R. FLIPPIN.

Mayor of Memphis.

W. B. GALBRATTH,

President Memphis Cotton Exchange.

Official:
By order of the board of directors Memphis Cotton Exchange.
JNO. S. TOOF,

By order of the board of officers of the Memphis Chamber of Commerce.

JNO. S. TOOF,

JAMES S. LEATH.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2808) for the relief of James S. Leath, of Memphis, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LA GRANGE SYNODICAL COLLEGE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2809) for the relief of the La Grange Synodical College of La Grange, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the freedman's branch of the Adjutant-General's Office for the year ending June 30, 1875, reported back the same and moved that it be recommitted to the committee, and that the letter and accompanying report be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. KATE L. ROY.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2810) for the relief of Mrs. Kate L. Roy, widow of Lieutenant-Colonel James P. Roy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS IN THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AT PITTSBURGH.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the House with all the correspondence upon the subject of the change of officers in the custom-house at Pittsburgh; also, with a statement of any other influence not in writing which induced a revocation of his request for the resignation of the surveyor of the port at Pittsburgh.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2811) to remove the political disabilities of C. A. Williamson, of New York; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GOODE. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire whether this bill is accompanied by the usual petition?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir; the Clerk has the petition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PIPER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2812) to amend an act supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. The Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to ask the House to take some action on the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies for certain Indians. The bill passed the House appropriating $100,000. It went to the Senate and was there amended by striking out $100,000 and inserting $150,000. The Committee on Appropriations instructed me to move a non-concurrence in that amendment; and I ask unanimous consent to take that bill are now.

No objection being made, the Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows: A bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in appropriations for certain Indians.

The amendment of the Senate was in line 5, after the words "one hundred," to insert the word "fifty."

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the amendment be non-concurred in. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to ask a committee of onference?

Mr. ATKINS.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not. Mr. HOLMAN. We understand that under the rules under ordinary circumstances the request for a conference shall come from the branch of Congress which insists on the amendment.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO ELECTION FUNDS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes before one o'clock; and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on the Judiciary. The House will now resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 876) reported from the Committee on the Judiciary making it a misdemeanor for any person in the employ of the United States to demand or contribute election funds. The bill was still pending at the close of the morning hour yesterday. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that the Clerk report the original bill, the amendments reported from the committee, the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Brown,] and the amendment moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of the act it shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand from any other person so employed any money or other valuables to be used as an election-fund or to defray the expenses of an election in any State, county, or national election in the United States.

SEC. 2. That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons employed in the service of the United States, in any manner whatever, to contribute any money or other valuable thing to be used as an election-fund or to aid in the expenses of any election or canvass for an election in any State, county, or district in the United States.

election or canvass for an election in any state.

States.

SEC. 3. That any person violating the provisions of either of the preceding sections shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the cause.

SEC. 4. That the judges of the district and circuit courts shall give this act in charge to grand juries.

In section 1, line 5, after the word "demand," insert the words "or solicit;" so that it will read: "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand or solicit from any other person so employed," &c.

The substitute moved by Mr. Brown, of Kentucky, was read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

SECTION 1. That no officer or employé of the Government shall require or request, give to or receive from, any other officer or employé of the same or other person, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or other thing of value, for political purposes; and any such officer or employé who shall offend against the provisions of the act shall at once be dismissed from the service of the United States, and also be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, fined not less than five hundred nor more than three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case.

SEC. 2. That the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of the offenses created by this act.

SEC. 3. That the judges of the district and circuit courts shall give this act in charge to the grand juries.

The amendment moved by Mr. Hoar was then read, to add to section 2 of the original bill the following:

Provided, Nothing herein shall be construed to prevent voluntary contributions for the purpose of circulating documents or procuring public addresses for the purpose of giving information on questions of public interest.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] now in his seat. I understood that his amendment was to be considered as pending to the original bill and also to the substitute. The SPEAKER. The Chair is well aware of the desire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] but did not understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown] assented to that arrange-

Mr. BLAINE. I would then move—
The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown] if he consents to the pendency of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to his substitute?

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I prefer not.

Mr. BLAINE. I now move as an amendment to the original bill that which I ask the Clerk to read. And I also move the same amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Browx,] as I believe I have the right to do. I do not know where it will properly adjust itself to the substitute; but in time I will so adjust it. I move the amendment to both the original bill and the substitute, so that in case the House should adopt either they may have my amendment incorporated.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. Can the gentleman move two amendments at once?

Mr. BLAINE. What is to prevent my moving an amendment to the original bill and also to the substitute?

Mr. HOLMAN. That cannot be done.
Mr. BLAINE. Why not?
Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman certainly can move but one amendment, make but one motion at a time.

Mr. BLAINE. Why not?

Mr. HOLMAN. Simply because—

Mr. BLAINE. A gentleman can move an amendment and an amendment to an amendment while on the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. We think not. We think that a gentleman entitled to the floor can offer but one amendment, which must be voted

Mr. BLAINE. I know very well what the rule is, and I know also that the uniform practice of the House has been to regard an amendment pending in the nature of a substitute as amendable. I move to amend the original bill, and I also move the same amendment to the substitute. That has been done a thousand times in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the practice of the House has been the reverse of that. A member may offer one amendment and one only; I have very often heard the ruling of the Chair to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] does not offer two amendments to the original bill. He moves an amendment to the text of the original bill and a similar amendment to the text of the substitute. The Chair does not think that it is out of order to move two amendments under such circumstances.

Mr. BLAINE. I felt sure that the Chair must so hold, because that is not only the rule of the House, but it has been the uniform practice of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must say that it is not the uniform practice of the House, though the rule may be as stated.

Mr. BLAINE. I must differ with the gentleman in regard to the practice of the House. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, line 2, by inserting after the words "United States" in follow-

Amend section s, this s, by instantage in gwords:

Or any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress.

And at the close of the section add:

And the contribution of money or other valuable thing as herein prohibited by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall, in addition to the penalties herein prescribed, operate as a disqualification to his holding his seat.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to congratulate the House upon the formal surrender, if I may use that word, of that extreme doctrine of State rights which the other side of the Chamber have for many years held, in regard to the power of the General Government in any way to regulate elections in the States. It has been the function and, as they considered it, the duty of the republican party in Congress to pass certain enactments, designed to enforce purity and fairness in elections. They have usually been very strenuously resisted by our friends on the other side, on the ground that the National Government had no power whatever to interfere with, or in any way to control, elections in the States.

This bill proposes to go down into the States and to the counties, and to make it a penal offense, punishable in the courts of the United States, for any officer to contribute any money toward even a county election. I think it a very suggestive, and to me it is a very gratifying, circumstance, that the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, composed of very able gentlemen, a large majority of them demo-crats, and the chairman a State-rights democrat, have reported, and, as I understand it, unanimously, a bill proposing to regulate elections in States and counties.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman abow me to asshim a question?
Mr. BLAINE. Not just now. I am just in the continuity of a certain argument. I will yield to the gentleman in due season.
Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I wish but a second.
Mr. BLAINE. I will yield hereafter to the gentleman if he will let me state my proposition without interruption now.

Now this, Mr. Speaker, I regard as a very significant circumstance in the political history of the times; and it is a very gratifying circumstance, because from it we may feel assured that the democratic party will unite with the republican party in all measures necessary to secure the purity and fairness and equality of elections throughout to secure the purity and fairness and equality of elections throughout the United States. It was very well remarked yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoan,] who offered an amendment to this bill, that the worst form of government in the world to live under is a government of the people when the majority is bribed; and he stated very well that there was only one thing worse than the bribing of voters, and that was the fraudulent count of the votes after they were deposited in the ballot-box.

Now, I do not wish to embarrass this bill. I do not wish to put a single amendment on the bill that shall go outside of its legitimate object and purport. I shall not seek to have the House cover more objects than it can well carry out. But, at the same time, I take it to be a legitimate and pertinent subject to this debate to say that, inasmuch as our friends on the other side have surrendered and given up for the sake of purity in elections their constitutional scruples in regard to the right of interfering with and controlling the elections in States, we ought to go one step further. And I am glad that I have in States, we ought to go one step further. And I am glad that I have the attention this moment of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker,] because only within the last month I was very much interested in reading the account of a very extraordinary case that happened in Virginia in the election of a State senator. A contest came before the senate of Virginia, which body is certainly very largely—I do not know but unanimously—democratic. The committee of elections reported by a very decided majority in favor of the republican contestant; but a minority report was sustained by the senate; and the sitting member was retained in his seat.

Now, that case presents so extraordinary a feature and invites so directly the legislation of Congress, that I venture to state it to the House; and if in any way I should misrepresent it, my honorable friend from Virginia will correct me. It seems that in Virginia there is a law permitting inspectors of elections, in case there is a larger number of ballots found in the box than there are names upon the registry, to do what they call "purging the ballot-box." They blind-fold a man, who puts in his hand and draws out enough of the ballots to reduce the number left to the number of the names on the registry. to reduce the number left to the number of the names on the registry. Now, in this ballot there was found to be a very large number of tickets in excess of the number of names registered. I wish I had one of those tickets here. The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] hands me a specimen of each of the two sorts of tickets. One, it will be observed, is of very large size, being several inches each way, while the other is about an inch and a half long by an inch wild. It is homorable that the very bligger conditate of the state of the wide. It so happened that the republican candidate was voted for while. It so happened that the republican candidate was voted for upon a larger ticket. There were many hundreds more ballots in the box when the polls closed than the names on the registry—of course put there fraudulently. The inspectors in this case I believe were all democrats, were they not? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] so states; I of course do not undertake to state the facts from my own knowledge. The blindfolded man, when he put his band in

Mr. GOODE. If the gentleman asks for information on that point,

I can give it to him.

Mr. BLAINE. I was addressing another gentleman.

Mr. GOODE. My colleague may not be able to give the facts as I

Mr. BLAINE. Wait till I state the case. If I do not state it correctly, the gentleman can then do so. The blindfolded man put his hand into the ballot-box, and almost as a physical necessity drew out the large ballots; so that when the poll was finally declared, although the large ballots; so that when the poll was finally declared, although there were notoriously and undeniably several hundred republican voters in the precinct, there were only five republican votes in the ballot-box. [Laughter.] Of course in the language of "Hon. Bardwell Slote," the democrat was elected "by a large majority."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention to overstate this case. If I have misstated it, I would gladly be corrected. If I have not misstated it, I am sure that honorable gentlemen on the other side, who must be just as anxious to secure fair results as we on this side, will write the intercept of the thore is a great a precessity for legis.

unite with us in agreeing that there is as great a necessity for legislation which shall secure an honest vote and a fair count as there is for providing that some poor, impoverished clerk shall not have five or ten dollars wrung out of him for election expenses. With that part of the bill I entirely sympathize—more for the sake of the clerk than on any other ground, because I think what the clerks have contributed has never amounted to a very large "corruption fund," whereas their contributions may have seriously inconvenienced themselves in a peenniary sense.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] hands me a report showing that in 1856 the clerks were assessed twice in one year. It was a hard year for the democrats, and Pennsylvania was very close. [Laughter.] It took two assessments out of the poor clerks that year. I do not know the republicans have ever taken more than one. [Laughter.] Here it is in the testimony of one J. L. Cramer:

Question. Do you know for what State or for what purpose that money was collected either in 1856 or 1858?

Answer. I think the money of 1856 was collected to be appropriated to pay some balance to be supplied in Pennsylvania. If I remember aright, the democratic State committee had got into debt quite a sum of money, and it was with a view of liquidating that debt that the money was raised. It was just after the October election, I think. There was another collection to pay for some documents which had been printed to be distributed.

Q. Were there not two assessments made that year—one before the election and one afterward—to make up a deficiency?

A. That is what I spoke of. I think one was before election and one to make up a deficiency. I was under the impression the deficiency was the only one I had anything to do with.

I am not standing here to maintain that all parties have not been in the habit of doing this thing. There is no need of Phariseeism about it. It is a well known and recognized fact that persons holding about it. It is a well known and recognized fact that persons holding official positions in the United States have been in the habit of contributing toward election and campaign expenses. I do not think, however, so far as I know, there has been coercion under the republican régime in Washington. Ido not think that persons have been discharged or threatened for failing to contribute. I do not say I know it was done in democratic days either. That both parties have been in the habit of receiving assessments and contributions from their officeholders is something altogether too well known and altogether too notorious to be denied or quibbled about.

It may run into a great evil, and I thank the gentlemen of the Judi-It may run into a great evil, and I thank the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee for proposing a remedy for that evil. I also thank the House for the very large majority with which yesterday they indicated their purpose of striking at an evil which is far graver than that, because I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that the contributions which are made in congressional elections, both by those who are successful and those who are defeated, exceed by many times over at every congressional election the sums which are contributed by persons holding Federal or State offices. I think that is equally notorious; and if we design to correct this evil, to cut it up by the roots, we should extend this law so that neither a Representative in Congress nor a Senator nor a Delegate in Congress nor a candidate for gress nor a Senator nor a Delegate in Congress nor a candidate for either of these places shall use money for the purpose of promoting his election.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Townsend] desires me to yield the floor to him, and I will do so at this time.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I believe the gentleman agreed to yield to me.

Mr. BLAINE. I did; and, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will excuse me, I will yield first to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I only ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question. He indulged in certain criticisms upon the original bill as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary. Am I to understand that he deems the substitute offered by myself open to the same objections urged by him against the original bill?

Mr. BLAINE. By a casual reading of the substitute I think it is. Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I think not.

Mr. BLAINE. In what respect does it differ from the original bill? Where is the difference between the two?

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It will take me some time to define of the Government.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It will take me some time to define the difference.

Mr. BLAINE. If I understand the gentleman, he proposes to punish any one who interferes in a State election by contributing money.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Not at all, except officers or employés

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman means to have a free blow in State elections, and only tries to control national elections.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It only applies to officers or employés of the Government who shall give or solicit money or other thing of value in any election; but I will read it:

That no officer or employé of the Government shall require or request, give to or receive from any other officer or employé of the same or other person, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or other thing of value for political purposes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now read the third section, that the judges of the district and circuit courts shall give this act in charge to the grand

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. From page 19.

Mr. BLAINE. In what respect now does the gentleman hold that it differs from the original bill? The bill says for national, State, or county, and the gentleman's substitute states for "political purposes." Does not that include State and county elections? There is no lim-

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It applies only to officers or employés of the Government, and not to persons not in employment of the Government

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, who interfere in State elections for political purposes, as you say. Suppose an Auditor or Comptroller in the city of Washington chooses to send a fifty-dollar bill out to Kentucky, or wherever he resides, to be used in a State election, or in a county election for a State officer or a county officer, does not the gentleman's bill punish him?

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It punishes an officer or employé of the Government, and not those not so employed.

Mr. BLAINE. What for ?

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. For contributing money for political

Mr. BLAINE. In his own State, in any State or county?

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It does not relate to any person not in the employment of the Government who may contribute money in State elections, but proposes to punish all such officers or employes as may accept, give, or solicit money for political purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, if the gentleman makes any point at all, it is that he would not seek to correct corruption in State elections, but only in national elections.

Mr. LUTTRELL. State laws will provide against that.

Mr. BLAINE. Then he does not go with the bill of the committee?

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. No, sir; but with the substitute.

Mr. BLAINE. He wants to save the State-rights doctrine. I now ield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment which send to the deal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided. That any expenditures for election purposes allowed by the laws of any State shall not be construed as being affected by the provisions of this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer that amendment feeling that the bill as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary interferes very materially with the laws of the State of Pennsylvania in regard to allowing election expenses; and in order that the House may understand how far the laws of Pennsylvania allow election expenses, I ask the Clerk to read the sections which I have marked.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania what part of the original bill he proposes to amend?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. My amendment is to the first section of the bill, which provides that-

From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand from any other person so employed any money or other valuables to be used as an election-fund or to defray the expenses of an election in any State, county, or national election in the United States.

I desire that at the end of that section the proviso may be inserted; and that the House may understand my reason for doing so, I ask the Clerk to read the law of my State, which allows certain electioneering expenses as being proper and legitimate.
The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

No person who shall hereafter be a candidate for the nomination or for election to the senate or house of representatives, or to any office of the judiciary, or to any State, municipal, or county office in this Commonwealth, shall pay or contribute, either directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing, or knowingly allow it to be done by others for him, either for the nomination, election, or appointment, except necessary expenses, as follows, to wit:

1. For printing and traveling expenses.
2. For olissemination of information to the public.
3. For political meetings, demonstrations, and conventions.

The foregoing expenses may be incurred either in person or through other individuals or committees of organizations duly constituted for the purpose, but nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the payment of money or other valuable thing for the vote or influence of any elector, either directly or indirectly, at primary, township, general, or special elections, nominating conventions, or for any corrupt purposes whatever incident to an election. And all judicial, State, county, and municipal officers hereafter elected shall, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the oath prescribed by section 1 of article 7 of the constitution of this Commonwealth.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, Now, it will be characted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Now, it will be observed that the original bill coming from the Committee on the Judiciary would prevent any person from contributing to the expenses of an election, as allowed by the State of Pennsylvania. It would prevent any individual from contributing to the printing of tickets, to the printing of the addresses of the chairmen of county committees, from contributing to the expenses of holding political meetings, political demonstrates strations, political conventions, and, in fact, it would prevent any officer from contributing to election expenses in any shape or way whatsoever. I submit to those gentlemen on the other side of the House, who are stringently in favor of State rights, that their bill will override the law of my State and prevent the contribution to all such expenses as are provided for and allowed by the law of the State of Pennsylvania, and make unlawful there what is lawful now. I hope there may be no objection to the addition of that proviso.

I hope there may be no objection to the addition of that proviso. It refers entirely to State elections.

Mr. BLAINE. Two gentlemen from Virginia rose to interrupt me. If I misunderstood the law of Virginia and its operation, I shall be glad to be corrected. My remarks were addressed to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker,] with whom I have the honor to serve on the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. Tucker. I did not rise, because really I was not cognizant of the facts of the case. My colleague from Virginia [Mr. Goode] in whose district the election occurred will be able to state the facts, and therefore I yield to him.

therefore I yield to him.

Mr. GOODE. I am sorry, sir, that the distinguished gentleman from Maine has thought proper to go out of the record in discussing a simple matter of legislation, for the purpose of making an unfriendly critieism upon the action of the people whom I have the honor to represent upon this floor; and I am sure that if the gentleman was familar with the law of Virginia governing elections and with the facts of this case, he would have hesitated before going beyond the record in order to lug into this discussion what he conceives to be an injury done to his party friends in Virginia.

Now, sir, I will say for the information of the gentleman from Maine that the law of Virginia under which that election was held for the purpose of carrying into operation and in good faith the balthe purpose of earlying into operation and in good fath the ballot system, to which we were strangers until it was put upon us by a convention known as the Underwood convention, composed, a large majority of it, of the gentleman's friends. The law of Virginia provides that whenever the ballots are closed it shall be the duty of the judges of the election to canvass the returns; that the ballots shall be taken from the ballot-box and shall be counted, and shall be made to compare with the poll-list, and if it appears after the count of the ballots that the number in the ballot-box does not correspond with the number upon the poll-book, that must be corrected. And the law proceeds to provide the manner in which it shall be corrected. It provides that the two judges of election, sworn officers of the law shall be blindfolded, and that they shall draw from the ballot-box tickets until the number remaining in the ballot-box shall be made to orrespond with the number on the poll-book.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I stated it with precise accuracy.

Mr. GOODE. Allow me a moment further. The gentleman has referred to the case of Brady against Gayle, a contested-election case in the State of Virginia coming from the Portsmouth district. The gentleman said that all the three judges of election in that case were conservatives or democrats. I say for the information of the gentleman that he is mistaken; that one of them was a pronounced republican, and if I am correctly informed he has stated that the drawing of the ballots on that occasion was done in strict conformity to law.

Mr. BLAINE. Was he the one that drew out the ballots? Was he the blindfolded man?

Mr. GOODE. No, sir, he was not; but the other two proposed that he should be the one, and he declined, having more faith in the honesty and integrity of his colleagues than the gentleman from Maine has, who knows nothing about them.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the democrats got their hands in and pulled out the ballots. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODE. I undertake to say that they pulled them out in strict conformity to the law and in the way prescribed by law.

conformity to the law and in the way prescribed by law.

Now I will ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit me.

Was he a member of the Congress that decided the case of Hunt Was he a member of the Congress that decided the case of Hunt against Sheldon in the State of Louisiana, and did he not vote in favor of Sheldon in that case, and did not the record in that case prove that the commissioners and judges of elections in the State of Louisiana counted every solitary vote in every precinct giving Sheldon a majority, and threw out every solitary vote in the precincts giving Hunt a majority, on the ground that there was fighting at the rolls and therefore there was no freedom of election?

polls, and therefore there was no freedom of election?

Mr. BLAINE. I was a member of that House, but I was not on the floor; I was in the chair when the case of Hunt vs. Sheldon was decided, but I should be very sorry if the gentleman, for the purpose of vindicating the excellence and purity of the Virginia laws, should attempt to do so by taking the revolutionary proceedings which have occurred in Louisiana during the last six or eight years as a prece-

Now the gentleman admits that I have stated with precise accuracy the mode in which elections are held in Virginia; and, if I am correctly informed, in a large majority of the counties in Virginia there is no republican representative whatever among the inspectors or judges of elections, and they have the matter in their own hands and they have it by reason of these small tickets. It is a simple fact that under that law, if the judges wish to deprive the minority, or it may be even the majority, of their rights at the polls, it is perfectly easy for them to do it; and to hold an election in that way, I care not who is responsible for the law, is no better than to decide it by throwing dice, and in that case it is throwing dice with one party having the dice loaded. I say that a ticket of that size-[holding up one, as follows:]

and I have seen one still smaller; I think I have seen them not more than half that large—I say that a ticket of that size is itself prima acie evidence of an intention to commit fraud.

Mr. GOODE. I am sure the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent the people of Virginia in regard to their statute-laws; and I will say, as he seems entirely misinformed on the subject, that we have laws on the statute-book requiring judges of our courts to appoint three judges of election for each precinct, and that one of them shall be of the opposite party to the other two.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, and I have the authority of a distinguished gentleman from Virginia; I have no concealment about it; it is no other than Ex-Governor Henry A. Wise.

Mr. GOODE. We do not recognize Henry A. Wise as a democrat, if you please. Mr. BLAINE. Mr. BLAINE. All right; he does not belong on our side, and I have his authority for saying that the pretense in Virginia of giving one of the inspectors to the opposite side is an outright fraud, and, to use his own words, "a fraud which out-Kelloggs Kellogg, out-carpetbags the carpet-baggers, and out-scalawags the scalawags." [Laugh-

That is just what he said to me; and he is aching for an opportunity to state it to a committee of this House.

Mr. WHEELER. He will have an opportunity of doing it in the case of the gentleman from Virginia who was just on the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not intend to bring that in, but my friend has mentioned it.

Mr. GOODE. I will be prepared when that case comes up to meet him or any other gentleman.

Mr. BLAINE. I hold in my hand an instructive volume. Here is.

a case relating to some ancient democratic practices.

Cornelius Wendell testifies that, under a democratic administration, he agreed to give 43 per cent. of the printing bills for the purpose of carrying the election for the democrats, and this question was addressed to him:

Question. Do you mean 43 per cent. of the profits?

I want the House to hear that.

Question. Do you mean 43 per cent. of the profits?

Answer. No. sir; 43 per cent. of the gross amount. We go by gross amounts entirely when we speak of percentage. I have been in the habit of doing the work for everybody who needs it, having the materials here, sometimes receiving or paying a percentage, as the case may be.

I do not wish to lug in the names of men who are gone, but this is historic.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. The President was a party to this arrangement, was he? Answer. Yes, sir; but I cannot say that he ever designated any particular man to be paid.

Now that bears a very striking resemblance, in its moral effect and in its moral bearing, to a case that has been convulsing this House of late, and of which I presume we will hear still more. Here was a deliberate arrangement with the man who became the Congressional Printer to pay 43 per cent. of the gross amount paid him for that printing for the purpose of carrying the elections for the democrats. That was when the democrats had control of this Government and of this House; that was the last experience we had of them in this

Now my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] who yesterday spoke so eloquently about the degeneracy of the times and the venality of the times, would hardly believe—he certainly must have forgotten—that that was in the freshness and greenness of the youth of his long congressional service; and that away back, when the denocrats had absolute control here, the public printing was deliberately farmed out with the distinct understanding and with the knowledge of the Administration that 43 per cent. of the gross amount should be devoted to the purpose of carrying elections for the democrats.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] forgets

two things, and one of them he ought not to forget. The first is that the statement which he reads from the document before him was not finally sustained, but on the contrary, upon an examination of the whole testimony, it will not appear that any officer of the Government was implicated in that fraud. Secondly, the bare suspicion of that fact produced a political revolution in the country and brought his party into power.

Mr. BLAINE. This is the identical Congressional Printer on the stand, the identical Cornelius Wendell; it is no outside or hearsay

Mr. HOLMAN. I am aware whose testimony the gentleman read. But the whole testimony taken together disproves the statement in the broad attitude in which it appears upon the printed page from which the gentleman read. But I desired to call his attention more especially to the other fact, that the suspicion that the officers of the Government were instigating such frauds produced a political revoovernment were instigating such tradits produced a political revolution which brought the gentleman's party into power. And does the gentleman expect that a widespread suspicion at this time, one well founded, will not produce a corresponding result?

Mr. STOWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STOWELL. I will.

Mr. STOWELL. My colleague [Mr. GOODE] is correct in stating that the law of Virginia provides that there shall be three judges of elections and that the law of the station of the stations and that the law of the stations are stations and that the law of the stations are stations.

elections, and that one shall be a republican; and that the judges of elections shall be appointed by the judges of the courts of the several counties. But in point of fact—I speak now of my own district more particularly, because I am more familiar with it—I know of but one county in my district in which the county judges appointed a republican inspector or judge of election. In the other eleven counties of my district the judges of election are democratic throughout; all the election officers are democrats. And the ticket that has been shown here to-day by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] is the ticket that was used against me at the last election in the city of Peters-

the city of Petersburgh:

City of Petersburg, Virginia. ELECTION. For Representative in Congress From 4th District: Judge Wm. H. Mann, OF Nottoway County.

The ticket cast for me at the same election was about five inches by three inches.

It is a well-known fact that in the city of Petersburgh there was not a republican upon any election board in any of the wards of that city. And when the polls were closed everybody was excluded from the room; no one left in the room but the three democratic judges of election and two clerks.

Mr. BLAINE. All democrats?
Mr. STOWELL. All democrats. One of them was blindfolded, and drew out the tickets, the republican tickets of course.

Mr. BLAINE. My hour is running out.
Mr. STOWELL. One point; the gentleman from Norfolk [Mr. Goode] stated that in the election in the city of Portsmouth, to which reference has been made, the two democratic judges of election asked the republican judge to be blindfolded. I believe that is correct, so far as my information goes. The gentleman is also correct in stating that the republican judge refused to be blindfolded, and he stating that the republican judge refused to be blindfolded, and he gave as his reason that he would not be a party to any such fraud.

Mr. HOAR. I was out of my seat when this bill first came up this morning. I understand that the Chair was advised that the amendment which I moved yesterday was moved only to the original bill, but not to the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Brown.] If the Chair will pardon me I will state my recollection of the matter. The gentleman from Kentucky as I winderstead him first said that he The gentleman from Kentucky, as I understood him, first said that he would not object to my amendment being regarded as pending to his substitute. Then afterward, when I asked if my amendment was considered as pending both to the original bill and to the substitute, the gentleman from Kentucky said: "Before making that arrangement with the gentleman from Massachusetts I would like to hear his amendment again reported." After it was again reported the gentleman from Kentucky made no further objection to it. My attention was again called to the matter when the Chair called for a vote on the previous question and appropried the gentleman from Kentucky made no further objection to it. announced the order in which the amendments and bill would be voted upon, stating that my amendment was pending and applicable both to the original bill and the substitute, that the question would first be on my amendment to the substitute and then on my amendment to the original bill. But in order that there may be no doubt about it

I move it now as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. I suppose he will agree with my recollection that he said he would hear my amendment read before determining whether he would allow it, and that after the reading he made no objection

while ago. Mr. HOAR. Mr. HOAR. I was not present when the Chair made that statement. The SPEAKER. The Chair inquired of the gentleman from Kentucky, who did not very distinctly state his recollection; but this morning he declined to consider the amendment as pending.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the amendment now. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] now offers, as an amendment to the pending substitute, the proposition which he offered yesterday as an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr.

McCrary.]
Mr. McCrary. Mr. Speaker, I was very glad to co-operate with the Judiciary Committee, and I shall be very glad to co-operate with all the Judiciary Committee, and I shall be very glad to co-operate with all the gentlemen of the House in this effort to provide for the purity of elections by means of an act of Congress. I have heretofore had occasion to take some part in other efforts directed to this same end. I have not on former occasions had the co-operation and the assistance of gentlemen on the other side of the House; I am very glad to have it now. Mr. Speaker, the general purposes of this bill meet with my hearty approval. The evil which is sought to be corrected is one which ought to be corrected. That evil is the practice which has existed among all parties in this country of levying in some form something in the nature of an assessment upon office-holders high and low for the purpose.

nature of an assessment upon office-holders, high and low, for the purpose of raising money to meet the expenses of election campaigns. That I am quite willing to prohibit; that I am desirous of prohibiting, and I am ready to support any measure which looks to that end. But, sir, I rose especially to say that I think the House ought to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.] The bill, without that amendment, goes too far. I would like to call attention to the scope of the bill if it shall not be amended. The first section is right. It provides that—

It shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand from any other person so employed any money or other valuables to be used as an election-fund.

That is entirely proper. But the second section, if not amended, is too broad, for it declares that—

It shall not be lawful for any person or persons employed in the service of the United States, in any manner whatever, to contribute any money or other valuable thing to be used as an election-fund or to add in the expenses of any election or canvass for an election in any State, county, or district in the United States.

Now, sir, in remedying what is known to be an evil, the House ought not to go so far as to prohibit an act which every gentleman upon the floor will concede to be perfectly right and entirely innocent. If this bill shall be passed without amendment, the simple fact that a man holds a commission as an officer under the Government of the United States will prohibit him from contributing any money or any valuable thing for the purpose of publishing and distributing in-formation, for the purpose of printing and circulating newspapers or public speeches or documents. It will in a word prohibit any man who happens to be an officer of the United States from contributing one dollar or one cent to distribute information in any possible way to be used in connection with a political campaign. And it prohibits it under a very severe penalty; for the third section provides that—

Any person violating the provisions of either of the preceding sections shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the cause.

I think, sir, that the House will hesitate to go so far as to prohibit under a penalty like that what we all agree is perfectly innocent and entirely proper in the nature of a voluntary contribution for a proper purpose

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desired, I believe, to ask me a question; and I yield to him for that

Mr. HOLMAN. Before putting the question, I wish to occupy just a moment with a single statement. Gentlemen on both sides will of course co-operate cordially in any measure that will secure purity in course co-operate cordiany in any measure that will secure purity in elections; but from the current of the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, it seems to me he proposes that this bill shall go far beyond its proper scope, and provide for curing such evils as might result from the legislation of States, as in the case in Virginia which he cites. Does the gentleman propose that legislation of Congress shall go to the extent of interfering with legislation of States as to the mode of managing elections?

Mr. BLAINE. I hold that the Congress of the United States has a perfect right to provide the "time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress."

ons for Representatives in Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BLAINE. That covers the ground.

Mr. HOLMAN. Undoubtedly Congress possesses that power.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the gentleman in favor of exercising it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am in favor of exercising it with a proper regard with a legislation of the State. for the legislation of the State.

Mr. BLAINE. Is he in favor of exercising it so as to achieve the end-so as to keep frauds of that little ticket kind from being perpetrated as with a play of loaded dice.

Mr. HOLMAN. So far as it applies to the election for members of Congress—and it can only apply to them—I think this legislation is proper. I think the spirit of the original bill, as well as of the substitute, is clearly within the province of Congress. The question is whether the gentleman proposes to go to the extent of curing evils of State legislation, of which he complains, in the State of Virginia. I hardly think he will seek to go that far.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall ask, Mr. Speaker, that this may be printed in the RECORD—I believe it is competent to do that—so the RECORD shall present a fac-simile; and I only regret that I have not got one about one-half the size, for I have seen a great many not over half

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman propose any legislation here which will reach that class of cases?

Mr. BLAINE. I said that if I proposed it on this bill, it would be charged that we were trying to lumber it down with other things; and therefore I shall not propose it now. I shall ask the Judiciary Committee, after having reported this bill, to take into consideration the far graver questions presented by such results as that. As the gentleman yesterday remarked, and I am but repeating myself in gentleman yesterday remarked, and I am but repeating myself in quoting them, bad as bribing the voter is, and it is an unendurable evil almost, it is not so bad as bold, naked fraud in the count. There you have literally taken away the foundations of free government. A fraud in the count is the destruction of republican government. One or two men may do more there than a thousand bribed men can do outside; and the Judiciary Committee are but sticking in the bark, they are pultering in a double sense if they put this forward as they are paltering in a double sense, if they put this forward as a remedy for securing purity in elections. This country demands elections shall be pure. There is not an honest man in either party who does not desire it. Without that, all government is a failure; and, sir, there is a widespread conviction to-day that in a good many of the States of this Union it is impossible to get a fair election. That the persons entitled to vote under the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution—the colored voters—get a fair show and equal chance to deposit their ballots is not believed by ten honest men north of Mason and Dixon's line, in my judgment. To that this thing should be addressed; to that this reform should go. We will go with you in this as far as he who dares go farthest. We invite you to go with us in providing, after we shall have destroyed bribery outside of the polling booth, that you shall not have the embediment of rescality here. ing-booth, that you shall not have the embodiment of rascality behind to vitiate and destroy the purity of elections within.

Now I wish to test the sense of the House on this matter. I believe every gentleman has made the amendment which he desires.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will allow me. I gave notice of an amendment yesterday, and now wish to offer one in lieu of that amendment. I wish to offer an amendment as a substitute for the first section of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. That amendment may take a good while to read. wish to test the sense of the House on the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to say one word. I hope the gentleman will extend that courtesy to me.

Mr. BLAINE. I must have the previous question first.
Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman's object is to get a good bill, he will allow my amendment to be offered.
Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection if that side of the House will consent. I do not wish to be taken off the floor without testing the sense of the House on the previous question; therefore I demand it. Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman demand it on the amend-

Mr. BLAINE. I demand it on the whole subject.
The SPEAKER announced that the vote by sound was against seconding the previous question.

Mr. BLAINE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Blaine and Mr. Caulfield appointed.
Mr. Caulfield. I rise to a point of order. I had the floor when the gentleman made his motion to reconsider. I ask whether, when he is through with his motion, the floor does not return to me by right?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine became entitled to the floor by the result of the action of the House, and was entitled to hold it for one hour this morning. Before the termination of that hour he demanded the previous question. As against that the gentleman from Illinois is not entitled to the floor.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 97.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is not seconded; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAULFIELD.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT:

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated by his Private Secretary, Mr. U. S. Grant, jr.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO ELECTION FUNDS.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr.

Mr. GOODE. I sympathize entirely with the object contemplated by the gentleman from Maine in the amendment which he has proposed. But it seems to me that his amendment goes entirely too far. In my judgment the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Maine is liable to grave and serious constitutional objec-The Constitution provides that-

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its

The Constitution further provides that-

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

It will be seen that these qualifications relate entirely to age, to citizenship, and to inhabitancy. Now, sir, the Constitution having prescribed these qualifications, I ask the gentleman from Maine if it is competent for this House or for Congress to prescribe additional qualifications? Does not the mention of these qualifications necessarily exclude all others? It is a familiar principle expressio unius alterius est exclusio.

Now, sir, would it not be equivalent to imposing additional qualifications upon a member of Congress if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine should be adopted? It says that, if any member of Congress shall be guilty of the offense denounced by this act, it shall ipso facto operate as a disqualification to hold the seat to which he has been elected. In other words, you prescribe qualifications additional to those prescribed by the Constitution. If we say that it is a disqualification to hold a seat for any man to commit this offense, is it not equivalent to saying that in order to qualify himself offense, is it not equivalent to saying that in order to qualify himself to hold the seat he must abstain from the commission of this offense?

Again, the Constitution provides that-Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from flice, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit un-er the United States.

It has been held that no Senator or Representative can be impeached. Now, sir, I ask the gentleman from Maine, if he disqualifies a member from holding office for the commission of this offense, does it not virtually amount to an impeachment of that member?

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman consent for himself and his side of the House to support the amendment, if that feature of it shall be

Mr. GOODE. No, sir; because I prefer the substitute.
Mr. BLAINE. I shall modify my amendment so that the gentleman shall not escape under that technicality.
[Cries of "Order" and raps from the Speaker's gavel.]
Mr. HÅMILTON, of New Jersey. I call the gentleman from Maine to order

Mr. GOODE. GOODE. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to propose my own amend-But I will ask the gentleman from Maine if he is about to abandon his amendment because he finds it obnoxious to constitutional criticism?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; I am going to change it because I do not want any technicality to be left as a pretext to excuse the gentleman

Mr. GOODE. It is very singular that we have had no proclamation of the gentleman of his intention to abandon his amendment until this criticism was made upon it, although the gentleman occupied the floor for an hour in advocacy of that amendment.

Now, sir, I insist that this is equivalent to the consequences of a conviction on impeachment in a case where no impeachment has been allowed by the Constitution. In other words, the same results follow from the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine which would follow under the Constitution from a conviction upon impeachment. I trust that the distinguished gentleman from Maine will not be allowed to encumber this bill with grave constitutional difficulties. It is an important bill. It is intended to correct a growing evil. It is intended to apply a remedy to a most flagrant and out-

The gentleman from Maine has thought proper to go into the district which I have the honor to represent. I will say for the information of that gentleman that at the navy-yard at Gosport, in Virginia, no man can get any employment without a recommendation from the resulting accountite committee, and that, whatever his mechanno man can get any, employment without a recommendation from the republican executive committee, and that, whatever his mechanical skill or his qualifications may be, he is ostracised unless he can come with the indorsement of the gentleman's partisan friends. I know, sir, of my own personal knowledge, and I can give chapter and verse to show it, that many poor mechanics, dependent upon their daily labor for their daily bread, are required by the republican executive committee in that locality to submit to pecuniary assessments.

I am glad the gentleman from Maine has turned his attention to Virginia. I hope he will prosecute his investigations. I hope he will Virginia. I hope he will prosecute his investigations. I hope he will go with me to the powers that be and invoke the powers of this Government for the suppression of this wrong and outrage in the locality to which he has referred in connection with the contested-election cases. I repeat that there are well-authenticated cases in which poor mechanics, dependent upon their daily labor for their daily bread, are compelled to submit to these pecuniary hardships, and to surrender a portion of their hard earnings in order to save the places upon which they are dependent for their bread, and not only for their own which they are dependent for their bread, and not only for their own bread, but for the bread of their wives and little ones. That is an everyday practice, sir, in the Norfolk navy-yard, and since the gentleman from Maine has thought proper to go into that locality I hope he will prosecute his investigation.

Sir, I was struck with the remark made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] when he said—and I honor him for the expression of the sentiment—that the practice of collecting money to be used for corrupt election purposes was the most dangerous practice to our liberties and that wherever this practice prevails it poisons the waters of civil liberty at its very fountain. It was a sentiment worthy to be commended, and I hope gentlemen on that side of the House will unite with us in suppressing this great wrong.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say it was "the" most dangerous practice to our liberties. I said it was "one of the" most dangerous.

Mr. GOODE. That is immaterial; I adopt the sentiment in whatever phraseology the gentleman may have couched it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] in his stump speech. In a certain contingency I may have an opportunity before the ides of November to discuss these questions. Unfortunately for the gentleman, it seems to be his habit of mind to stray into partisan politics whenever herises to address this House. We are here for the business of legislation, and for one mortal hour this morning we have been entertained by the gentleman with a harangue which would be appropriate on the stump

Now, in regard to my colleague, so called, from Virginia, [Mr.

STOWELL.]
Mr. STOWELL. Is that because you are not entitled to your seat? Mr. GOODE. The gentleman says that in Virginia the law is as I stated, that one judge should be selected from each political party. That is true; but if the gentleman had read further he would have That is true; but if the gentleman had read further he would have found that the law furthermore provides that all of the judges must be able to read and write. [Laughter.] Now the gentleman has the honor to hail from what is known as "the black district" in Virginia, and unfortunately, sir, there are not enough white republicans—I said unfortunately; I beg pardon, I meant fortunately—there are not white republicans enough to be found in the eleven counties which constitute his district to further the first his district to further the first him to be seen that the first him to be seen the seen from the seen that the first him to be seen to be seen the seen that the first him to be seen the seen that the first him to be seen that the s tute his district to furnish judges to meet the requirements of the law, who are able to read and write, [langhter,] and therefore it is that in his eleven counties only one republican judge of election, he says, has been appointed. Were not those democratic judges exceedingly fair? Does he not acknowledge their honesty and integrity and fairness when, democratic as they were, they had the honesty and the nerve to return the gentleman from Vermont—I beg pardon, from Virginia? [Laughter.]

Now, sir, he has eleven counties in his district, and there was not a solitary democratic delegate from his district from any of these counties, but they sent an unbroken republican delegation until recently his friend and partisan, his colored friend, Mr. Ruffin, was expelled from the house of representatives for petit larceny, and the men of all parties, democrats and republicans, blacks and whites, arose in their majesty and strength and elected a white man and a democrate because he was beyond.

Now, sir, such is the state of things in "the black district," which the gentleman has the honor to represent. If he will read the stat-ute he will find that the most plausible reason for not appointing re-publican judges of election in his district was that they could not be found who were able to read and write. I know that in the portion of the State from which I hail the judges (and I undertake to say they are as pure and incorruptible as ever adorned any bench in this land) have complied with the law and appointed in every case one republican judge of election.

Now I am indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Caulfield.] I rose to meet these personal allusions to my district, and if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] will read the contested-election case of Brady vs. Gayle he will find that, after a searching and honest inquiry by a committee of the senate of Virginia, the seat was awarded to Mr. Gayle by a vote of 18 to 11, and the contested of the senate of th they did it expressly upon the ground that the surplus ballots were drawn out by a blindfolded judge in the only way provided by law.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question about the black district. I would like him to state under whose training and administration of the laws the people of so large a district in Virginia are unable to read and write?

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman is bringing up the ghost of slavery.
Mr. HOAR. I asked but a simple question.
Mr. GOODE. I do not hesitate to say that, owing to the condition of servitude, these people have not had the opportunity to learn to read and write.

Mr. HOAR. My question is this: Whose fault is it? Is it the fault of the blacks?

Mr. GOODE. I do not intend to be drawn aside to discuss these issues; they are dead, and they belong to the dead past. The gentle-man cannot draw me into any such snare.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman was taunting the blacks of a district of his own State.

Mr. GOODE. I do not intend to be led into that discussion. I see the object of the gentleman, and, sir, it is altogether unnecessary for the fowler to spread his net in view of the bird. [Laughter.] I know what the gentleman is after; I understand his tactics; we have had them from the beginning of the session, and the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] led off in that direction. I for one do not mean to be led aside. I am here to discuss this bill, to do the work of legislation and the distinguishtion and the second results of the of legislation, and to serve the people who sent me here to the best of my humble ability.

I desire now to give notice that I will offer the following as an amendament.

ment both to the original bill and to the substitute, and shall ask a vote of the House upon it when the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] shall have been voted down, as I hope

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a point of order. I desire to inquire how many amendments to this bill are in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] offers an amendment to the original bill and to the

Mr. REAGAN. I desire that my amendment shall be first read in its order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments will be voted upon in the order in which they are presented, first to the original bill and then to the substitute.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a point of order. Under the rule I am entitled to a privilege of which I wish to avail myself. The previous question has not yet been seconded, and so long as it is not seconded I have the right to modify my amendment. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Goode] has criticised my amendment in its present form as violating the Constitution. Not wishing that any escape from a fair vote shall be had by a criticism of that kind, I modify my amendment.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I object to the amendment being modified.

Mr. BLAINE. But I have the right under the rule to modify it.
Mr. CAULFIELD. I insist that I still hold the floor.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] is certainly entitled to the floor. The Chair has not yet cognized the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. GOODE. I desire to say that my amendment is designed as an independent section, both of the original bill and of the substitute. I wish to say, however, that I most emphatically prefer the substitute to the original bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PAGE. I made a point of order, upon which I desire to have

Mr. PAGE. I made a point of order, upon which I desire to have the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. PAGE. I desire to know how many amendments can be offered to this bill and be pending at the same time. My point of order is that there are already pending more amendments than the rule allows.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] must know that many amendments can be pending, if offered to different portions of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at one time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not decide that. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be read.

Mr. BLAINE. That cannot be done until the other amendments are disposed of. The point of order made by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] must certainly be good.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I hold the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker of this House who has just left the chair decided that various amendments could be made to different portions of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I have raised a point of order, and I ask the ruling of the Chair upon it.

the Chair upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that various amendments can be offered to different sections of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. While an amendment and an amendment to an amendment are pending, is another amendment in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment does not go to the whole bill.

Mr. BLAINE. We are not considering this bill by sections.
Mr. GOODE. I only intended to indicate that if the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] should be voted down, I would move that amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all right.

Mr. GOODE. I ask that my amendment be read for information as portion of my remarks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] to call the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] and let that be disposed of, so that if it is adopted or rejected another amendment can be in order.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] to ask for the reading of his amendment as a part of his re-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to that. The Chair will reserve his ruling upon the point of order as to the order of amendments, when the time for that ruling shall have arrived. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk began to read, and read as follows:

That if any person, with a view to the election to or obtaining votes for the office

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The reading of this amendment furnishes no information as to the position it is proposed it shall occupy in the bill.

Mr. GOODE. I propose it as an independent section.

Mr. HOLMAN. To add this to the bill?

Mr. GOODE. Yes.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Let the Clerk proceed with the reading of the

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That if any person, with a view to the election to or obtaining votes for the office of President, Vice-President, or the place of Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or to the appointment to any office or post of honor or emolument under the Government of the United States of himself or any other person, shall use force or duress, by menace or violence to life, limb, property, or liberty, or shall commit bribery, or use money, property, or other thing of value, corruptly to influence any elector, voter, officer, or other person in or in respect to any election or appointment to any such office or post, he shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and be imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia

[Mr. HARRIS] for five minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will not consume five minutes. I rise merely to repel what might seem to be an insinuation or reflection upon the Legislature of our State providing for the mode of disposing of an excess of ballots found in the ballot-box. The gentleman from Maine said the law seemed to be framed designedly for the purpose of enabling the dominant party to commit fraud, to cheat at elections. Now, sir, it is known to the country that the intelligent portion of the convention which framed this provision was composed mainly of white men from the North who went down to Virginia after the war, and I wish the Clerk to read an extract from the Code of Vir ginia together with an extract from the Code of New York, by which it will be seen that the New York men who were members of our convention brought the New York law with them and incorporated into our code that special provision with a view to prevent fraud. The provision of our code on this subject is copied almost verbatim from the New York law, and the same law I understand prevails in a majority of the States of this Union.

In regard to the political complexion of the commissioners of election, I will say that in the district where I reside a republican is appointed in every case along with a democrat to superintend the election. After those two statutes are read, I shall have nothing further to say, except to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that our law was not framed for the purpose of facilitating cheating at elections, but was adopted in harmony with the law of New York, from which it was copied almost rerbatim. I ask the Clerk to read first the provisions of the Code of Virginia. The Clerk read as follows:

If the ballots in the ballot-box are still found to exceed the number of names on the poll-books, then the whole of the ballots shall be replaced in the ballot-box; and, after the same shall be well shaken, the conductor or one of the judges of the election, being blindfolded, shall draw therefrom a sufficient number of ballots to reduce the same to a number equal to the number of names of electors on the pollbooks.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Now I ask the Clerk to read the New York statute.

If, after having opended or canvassed the ballots, it should be found that the whole number of them exceed the whole number of votes entered on the poll-lists, the inspectors shall return all the ballots into the box, and shall thoroughly mingle the same; and one of the inspectors to be designated by the board shall publicly draw out of such box, without seeing the ballots contained therein, so many of such ballots as shall be equal to the excess, which shall be forthwith destroyed.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a very important difference between those statutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virgina. What is it?
Mr. BLAINE. The New York statute provides that the drawing shall be done "publicly."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir; the ballots are to be drawn in public; but it is provided also that the person shall not see the ballots. Our law provides, in order more effectually to prevent the person from group receiper the ballots.

or say the ballots, that he shall be blindfolded.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will please observe that I did not say the law was presumptive evidence of fraud, but that the use of such a ballot as this [exhibiting a ballot] under the law was presumptive evidence of fraud, but that the use of such a ballot as this [exhibiting a ballot] under the law was presumptive evidence of fraud.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. And the law of our State provides that both political parties may have their representatives present at the opening of the boxes and the counting of the ballots. It prevents a mob from coming; but each political party is entitled to have its chosen friends present.

Mr. WIKE. I desire to say that the law of Virginia on this subject is substantially the same as that of Illinois. Our law was passed by a republican Legislature and signed by a radical governor. I wonder that the radical members from the State of Illinois should have submitted to such an assault upon their election laws as the gentleman from Maine has made.

Mr. McCRARY. Has the gentleman ever known ballots such as have been exhibited by the gentleman from Maine to be used under

Mr. WIKE. That has nothing to do with the law,
Mr. McCRARY. It has a great deal to do with the fraud.

Mr. WIKE. Probably there is no State in the Union that provides by law the length or breadth or thickness of the paper on which elecby law the length of breath of the the paper of which elec-tion tickets are printed. The laws of some States make provisions in reference to the character of the tickets, but none so far as I know prescribe the size of the tickets.

Mr. PAGE. I will inform the gentleman that the States of California and Nevada have laws regulating the size of the ballots.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. Cox. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of unnecessary discussion here on this bill. Both parties in this House appear to be anxious for purity of elections. We all know how elections have been conducted in the Southern States since re-re-re-construction began. We all know how States have been overturned, as well by the use of military force as by legislative fraud and electoral impurity. Who are responsible for the long series of frauds in the Southern States? Our records will answer. Men have been elected to Congress by votes in this House who never were elected outside. It is pleasant now to see the gentleman from Maine all at once becoming so anxious about the purity of elections. coming so anxious about the purity of elections.

Mr Speaker, I do not like to refer to anything in connection with natural history in this House. [Laughter.] I have already got into some trouble by that; but I think I might be pardoned if I should refer to the gentleman from Maine as having shed some "crocodile tears" over this subject. There is a little bit of poetry that might apply to him:

How cheerfully he seems to grin; How neatly spreads his claws, To welcome little fishes in, With gently smiling jaws.

[Laughter.]

The gentleman from Maine is very sad and lugubrious over the condition of the suffrage in this country. Why did not his zeal and that of his party begin long since?

From the earliest period known to the common law; from the earliest decisions of English jurisprudence, notably in the leading case decided by Lord Holt, it was declared penal for an election officer to refuse a legal vote. From the time when such a thing as voting was first known to civilization, elections have been guarded against fraud and force by judicious and penal legislation. The old English law provided that the military should not come within three miles of a voting-place. How has that law been regarded by the party which has that yower as long?

I need not dwell upon the special tit-for-tat argument which has been here indulged in. That party is responsible for the great bulk of the electoral fraud in this country in the last ten years. I do not except New York City, where there was a combination of bad men of both parties; nor do I except Philadelphia, where in the election last fall there were thousands and thousands of fraudulent names placed upon the voting-lists. One day while I was in that city just before the election the court struck off over eleven thousand fraudulent votes

No one party can claim immunity from these frauds. We are all more or less responsible for them, at least until we make adequate legislation to prevent them. The gentleman may say it belongs to our party and dates back to the days of James Buchanan. He quotes the old report, often refuted, that Mr. Buchanan had some sinister complication with such matters. I will not go so far back, Mr. Speaker, but I will go far enough back to attract the attention of the gentleman from California, [Mr. Page,] who just rose with moral and mental horror at the condition of other States in respect to this subject. I do it, too, in order to inform the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.] When I was in California in the gentleman's district I happened to get two ballots then in vogue. happened to get two ballots then in vogue.

Mr. PAGE. That was not in my district. Do you refer to the Mare Island ballots?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.
Mr. PAGE. It is not in my district.
Mr. COX. I should not wonder if the same thing had been done in your district. [Laughter.]
Mr. PAGE. It is in the democratic district of my colleague, [Mr.

LUTTRELL. Mr. LUTTRELL. The frauds were practiced by the republican party. Mr. COX. Let me take care of that man. [Great laughter.] I do not and will not now say the gentleman's district. Mare Island is the district. How did he find it out? [Laughter.] Did you ever hear of it before? I happened to get two of these tickets when I was at Mare Island and wat them into my pocket-book but when I was in attended. Island and put them into my pocket-book, but when I was in attendance on the Greeley democratic convention some one stole my pocketbook, and so I lost my tickets. [Great laughter.]

Now by chance my friend from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] brings out the same sort of tickets. Here they are, [holding the tickets up.]

REPUBLICAN STATE TICKET.—For Governor, Newton Booth. For Lieutenant Governor, Romunido Pacheco. For Secretary of State, Drury Melone, For Controller, James J. Green. For State Treasurer, Ferdinand Bashr. For Surveyor-General, Robert Gardner. For Attorney-General, John L. Love. For Clerk of the Supreme Court, Grant I. Tangart. For State Printer, Thomas A. Springer. For Harbor Commissioner, John A. McGlynn, For Amed. to Art. 1 of the Const.—Yes. Refund Debt.—No. For Congressman.—Third District, John M. Coghian. For Assemblyman, M. J. Wright. For Shrving Joseph Jacobs. For Treasurer, E. D. Porkins. For Recorder, Geo. C. McKnier, For Clerk Class. A. Kidh. Administrator, Hazee Hoyt. For Governor, C. E. Holbrook. For Surveyor, Wm. W. Frich. For Survey of Schools For Treasurer, E. D. Dusta, A. D. Starr. For Coordinate, Ed. Longan and W. Markey. For Roadmaster, A. E. Thurber.

I wish if possible to have them printed in fac simile in the RECORD. I wish if possible to have them printed in fae simile in the RECORD. If it is possible to do this exactly, it would more than offset the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.] I believe I will go over and show them to gentlemen on the other side, if they will allow me. [Great laughter as Mr. Cox crossed to the republican side.] Here, gentlemen, are these two tickets voted at Mare Island. They call these tickets the "tape-worm ticket" in California. [Laughter.] They are got up for the purpose of forcing them into the hands, in terrorem, of the navy-yard employés; and this bill is intended just to stop that rascality.

Mr. PAGE. Allow me for one moment. The republican Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after this ticket was voted at Mare Island, or the Legislature immediately after the Island immediately at the Island immediately at I lature that met subsequently, passed a law requiring a ballot eighteen inches long and four inches wide. [Laughter.] They required that ballot to be printed on paper of a uniform color, describing the type and everything in connection with it. In fact they revived the election law of that State. That was signed by a republican governor, and was passed by a republican Legislature.

Mr. LUTTRELL. It was introduced in a democratic senate and by a democratic senator. I happened to be there and know.

Mr. COX. I have not spectacles which will magnify enough to enable me to see the names on these remarkable tickets. They are printed in such very small type, that I doubt whether there is any man here over the constitutional age to be a member who can read man here over the constitutional age to be a member who can read them. [Laughter.] The eyes that can read these tickets must belong to one twenty-five years old, not over. The letters are printed so small on these "tape-worm tickets" that you cannot see them, by any arrangement, mechanical or political. [Laughter.]

Why were they put into this fraudulent shape? They were republican tickets, and are we not often informed by the gentleman that his party has an excess of moral purity? Did it repeal the trickery which sent the republican candidate to Congress here last Congress but one? The deprecatic candidate for governer. Governor Hardy but one? The democratic candidate for governor, Governor Haight, was also defeated by the use of these scandalous devices. I know that Governor Haight was beaten by a pretty large majority; but if this thing ran in the same way into other districts as they did in the

this thing ran in the same way into other districts as they did in the Mare Island navy-yard district, it was not a fair beat.

Now a few more remarks on the "tape-worm ticket" and I am done. These tickets were intended to intimidate the workingmen, to cheat them of their fair free will. The scheme is apparent: "No vote in this way, no work." It is worse tenfold, Mr. Speaker, than the use of the military against the ballot. It is worse tenfold than the old English mischief which kept the military near the voting-place, and which English law undertook to punish. It is fraud. The same thing, somewhat modified, has been practiced in other navy-yards, and the primary object of this bill introduced by the Judiciary Committee, notwithstanding the gentleman from Maine tried to divert and company the gentleman from Maine tried to divert and company the gentleman from Maine tried to divert and company to the same thing the gentleman from Maine tried to divert and company the gentl notwithstanding the gentleman from Maine tried to divert and complicate and enshroud it with all sorts of meanings applicable to Congress and otherwise—the meaning of this bill was that the employés of the Government should not be taxed against their free will under of the Government should not be taxed against their free will under penalty of losing their bread and their places.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since I am going to make a few remarks on civil freedom I will leave this side of the House and go to my own. [Mr. Cox here, amidst great laughter, returned to the democratic side of the House.] I want the reporter, if it be possible, when he makes a fac simile of these tickets to count the names and offices upon them and the small space or slip allowed for the list, as that the property of the side of the small space of the side of the side of the side of the small space or slip allowed for the list, as that the property of the side of the small space of the side of the side of the small space of the side of the side of the side of the small space of the side of the and the small space or slip allowed for the list; so that we may see where the mischief is, and how proper it is to remedy it within our own jurisdiction as members of the Federal Legislature.

Now, I agree with the sentiment which was announced by the genthem an from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] and echoed on this side. I agree that one of the crying evils of our time is corrupt suffrage. The South more than any other section knows who has suffered by it. I believe that no higher grievance could be felt than the suffering under a had election system. And I will say this in conclusion, as the time a bad election system. And I will say this in conclusion, as the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] is nearly out, that of all things to be guarded in this House and elsewhere, above the judiciary, above legislation, above all other matters pertaining to a republican government, is the foundation of American and all other republican polity, a fair and honest suffrage. Without it all your other liberties will fail; or, as Emerson has it:

For what avail the plow and sail, Or land or life, if freedom fail?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield now to the gentleman from California,

[Mr. LUTTRELL.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I want to say a word in relation to these tickets. I represent the district in which these tickets were used. Mr. Cogh-Mr. LUTTRELL. lan, who was the candidate for Congress at that time, was elected by these tickets by a very large majority. The next year when I made a canvass of this district I exhibited these tickets throughout the disa canvass of this district I exhibited these tickets throughout the district, and although Grant carried the district by 5,000 majority, I was elected by some 1,200 majority. And, sir, in the next Legislature that was convened a bill was introduced by a democrat and passed by a democratic senate and the republican assembly was forced to adopt it, introducing a uniform system of balloting in my State.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will yield in a moment. I want to say further that the honest workingmen, who bear scars from head to foot received in the service of their country while fighting for the Union, were forced to walk up shoulder to shoulder with those tickets elevated in their right hands above their heads, while a navy-yard boss stood there with his book to count them and turn them off unless they voted that ticket?

Mr. PAGE. I want to ask my colleague whether he did not stump Sacramento County for NEWTON BOOTH, who was elected on that ticket?

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir; I did not stump Sacramento County for Newton Booth as governor; but I stumped the State for Henry H.

Mr. PAGE. When NEWTON BOOTH was candidate for Senator, did you not stump Sacramento County for him?

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir. I will tell you what I did do.

Mr. PAGE. Will my colleague answer my question?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can answer it in his

Mr. LUTTRELL. I aided the fusion ticket of democrats and liberal republicans, who abandoned the rotten republican party of California, and I stumped Sacramento County for that ticket; and that ticket was supported by the present attorney-general of my State and many of the leading democrats of my State, the present comptroller being one of them.

Mr. PAGE. Now, did you not stump for NEWTON BOOTH as Sena-

Mr. LUTTRELL. I never stumped the county for NEWTON BOOTH as Senator; never.

Mr. PAGE. I want to ask my colleague another question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not yield further. I tell my colleague that what he has stated is incorrect. I stumped Sacramento County for the democratic ticket, as I hope to do again at the next election, and against all those infamous frauds which have been heaped upon our against all those inflamous radds which have been heaped upon our State by the gentleman's own party leaders.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I resume the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Will my colleague yield for one question?

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman from California has not the floor any longer.

Mr. Speaker, since this discussion commenced yesterday I have been handed by a republican office-holder in this city the paper which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. This paper was inclosed in an envelope, postage paid, and having printed on it the name of the present postmaster of this city, as I understand:

Union Republican Congressional Executive Committee, Washington, D. C., August 7, 1875.

Washington, D. O., August 7, 1875.

Dear Sir: In view of the approaching presidential campaign and the State elections which are to occur the coming autumn, this committee has been directed to provide for the immediate and thorough re-organization of the republican party, and the circulation of such documents as will be essential for the work.

Assuming you to be a republican, desirous of maintaining the ascendency of the republican party, and thus securing the benefit of republican principles, and that to do this you are willing to contribute, to a reasonable extent, in providing the necessary and legitimate means to support the republican party, both in the form of personal effort and in the contribution of money, we hope you may be willing to send to the committee $12, to be expended as above indicated.

The committee desire to enter upon their duties at once, and it is of the utmost importance that they be able to make up the list of contributors and those who will take an active part in the work and to judge the extent of the means to be at their disposal by the 1st day of the coming month.

Please reply under cover of the inclosed envelope, and greatly oblige the committee and your obedient servant,

J. M. EDMUNDS,

J. M. EDMUNDS.

It is particularly desired that in replying to this letter the name of the post-office and State, together with the date and name of the writer and his official title, should be written clearly and legibly, in order that credit may be properly given.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The Clerk will please read the names of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Executive committee.—Hon. Z. Chandler, (chairman;) Hon. S. Cameron, Hon. John Coburn, Hon. John A. Logan, Hon. H. H. Starkweather, Hon. William M. Stewart, Hon. Marcus L. Ward, Hon. T. C. Platt, Hon. George C. McKee, Hon. J. M. Edmunds, (secretary,) Jacob Tome, (treasurer.) Union republican resident committee.—Hon. B. R. Cowen, Washington, District of Columbia; Hon. E. W. Barbour, Hon. Allan Rutherford, Hon. J. M. Edmunds, Col. C. W. Dave

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] that he may offer his amendment.
Mr. GOODE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After section 3 in the bill, and after section 1 in the substitute, add the following: Sec. 2. That if any person, with a view to the election to or obtaining votes for the office of President, Vice-President, or the post of Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or to the appointment on any office or post of honor or emolument under the Government of the United States, of himself or any other person, shall use force or duress, by menace or violence to life, limb, property, or liberty, or shall commit bribery, or use money, property, or other thing of value to influence any elector, voter, officer, or other person in or in respect to any election or appointment to any such office or post, he shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and be imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case.

Mr. PAGE. I insist on the point of order which I made a while ago. The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order and holds that the amendment is in order, because the treatment and discussion of this bill thus far has been upon the assumption that the House is acting on the bill by sections; hence it is that to the original text of the bill four amendments have been already permitted to be offered, not one of which was offered as an amendment to an amendment, but each one as an amendment to a separate and distinct part of the original bill. The bill having been so treated by the House, the Chair must therefore hold that the amendment is in order.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not wish to dissent captiously from any decision the honorable Speaker may feel called upon to make; still less do I wish to carry any difference to an appeal. But I do not think proper to remain silent and have it inferred that I concur in the decision wish to carry any difference to an appeal. But I do not think proper to remain silent and have it inferred that I concur in the decision just made in regard to so many amendments being in order at the same time. I think the ruling is new and extraordinary.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that, in accordance with the letter which was sent to the Clerk's desk to be read, by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAULFIELD.] documents were printed and circulars sent over the State of Ohio during the last political campaign. I saw but few other documents in that canvass, and I was actively engaged in it, except those coming from Washington from the union congressional committee. They were on various subjects, and particularly on "vaticanism in Europe and America," which greatly excited the public mind in the State of Ohio at that time. Why, sir, I understood that in the Western Reserve the good people would seek their homes long before the twilight came on through fear of the Pope, and after the election was over they measured the print of his "big toe" in the dust; and, if the republican papers are to be relied upon, they found it was forty feet long by actnal measurement. Those were the documents sent out there under the auspices of the union congressional executive committee, and paid for by contributions levied upon the clerks in the Departments. Now one word as to republican reform, one word as to civil-service reform under republican administration and under your republican President. In the year 1871, just before the last presidential campaign, the republican Congress passed a law providing that the Presreform under republican administration and under your republican President. In the year 1871, just before the last presidential campaign, the republican Congress passed a law providing that the President should establish a system of civil service and prescribe rules. The President did appoint the commission, and rules were devised by them, and among these rules the eleventh in number provided that there should be no assessment upon employés of the Government in the Government Departments; and, sir, it is a matter of notorious history that during the canvass of 1872 the clerks of the executive retired republican committee went into the Departments in this national republican committee went into the Departments in this city and solicited and accepted these contributions from the employés of the Government, and so openly and continually did the republican President violate the rules that were established by the republican civil-service commission that the chairman of that commission, Hon. George W. Curtis, was compelled to resign his position as chairman of the board, stating in his letter of resignation, as the reason for so doing, that the President himself had failed to observe and obey the rules prescribed by the commission. That was civil-service re-form under a republican administration. The time has come when we need reform in the civil service and either penal statutes or, what is better, a higher sense of public virtue on the part of officials, for the purpose of enforcing honesty in the elections.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now demand the previous question on the bill and on the pending amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a point of order. I simply desire to modify the amendment I offered before the previous question is seconded.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I think it is a right I have under the rules, and the gentleman's objection does not avail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) Will the gentleman from Maine have the rule read on which he relies ?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the uniform practice of the House has been to allow modifications to be made before the previous question is sec-

Mr. BLAINE. The rule states it negatively, "motions to amend cannot be modified after the previous question is seconded." That will be found on page 10 of the Digest, and the privilege of modifying has never been refused under the practice of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that the practice of the House has been to allow modifications.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman has not read the rules, so far as I have heard it

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Although the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has cited no positive rule, the Chair is of the impression that the uniform custom of the House has been to allow modifications to be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that was the ruling of the Chair when the Saint Croix land bill was pending.

Mr. BLAINE. I state what I know to be the absolutely uniform practice of the House, and the rule that I have read has no meaning at all unless it is that meaning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's statement is taken as absolute verity on that subject.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Goode] made

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from virginia [Mr. Goods] made the point—

Mr. CAULFIELD. I object to debate.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I modify my amendment as follows.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman rose to modify his amendment after I had called the previous question.

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; I said half an hour ago that I desired to modify my amendment, and the gentleman now occupying the chair

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine gave notice of it, and the Chair cannot take snap judgment on members. The Chair rules that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The question is, Who is attempting to take snap judgment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had no reference to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAULFIELD.]

Mr. HOAR. The rule is that amendments cannot be modified after

Mr. HOAR. The rule is that amendments cannot be modified after the previous question is seconded, not after it is called for.

The SPEAKER protempore. The Chair understands that perfectly. Mr. BLAINE. I want my amendment read as modified.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say that while an amendment, unless it has been changed by a vote of the House, may be modified, the mover cannot take the floor from another gentleman who is legitimately entitled to it for that removes.

titled to it, for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. The hour of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. BANKS. If that is so—
Mr. BLAINE. I waited until the hour was out.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] gave notice that he had modified his amendment and the Chair postponed it for the time. If there is anything wrong it is in Chair postponed it for the time. If there is anything wrong it is in the Chair postponing it.

Mr. BLAINE. The Chair is perfectly right.

Mr. CAULFIELD. How could the Chair postpone a motion when I occupied the floor?

Mr. BLAINE. He postponed it until you got through.

Mr. CAULFIELD. While I kept the floor or somebody representing me was on the floor, the gentleman had no right to make his motion. tion or to give notice of a motion, so that there could be no postponement by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already ruled on that point. The Clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read the modified amendment, as follows:

Amend section 2, line 2, by inserting after the words "United States" the follow-

Mr. BLAINE. Let mine be first read.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the close of first section of the substitute add:
And the contribution of any money or valuable thing, as herein prohibited, by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall be deemed a misdemeaner, and the offender, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the same.

Mr. BLAINE. This amendment disposes of the constitutional quibble made by the gentleman from Virgina, [Mr. GOODE.]

Mr. CAULFIELD. It is understood, of course, that these amendments are not accepted by the gentleman who reported the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments are pending before the House. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD.] mayes the previous question on the bill and all the [Mr. CAULFIELD] moves the previous question on the bill and all the pending amendments.

Mr. CAULFIELD. That is my motion.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question will be on the amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to the original bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask now that the original bill, the substitute, and the several amendments thereto be read in their order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the original control of the specific control of the s inal bill and the amendments thereto and the substitute and the amendments thereto.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, the substitute, and the ending amendments.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to the original bill was as follows:

In section 1, line 5, after the word "demand," insert the words "or solicit;" so that it will read: "It shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employ ment of the United States to demand or solicit from any other person so employed," &c.

Mr. WIKE. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill to permit the word "receive" to come in the amendment proposed by the committee; so that it shall read:

It shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employ of the Government to demand, receive, or solicit, &c.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent. Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order. Mr. BANKS. This bill is reported from a committee?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes.
Mr. BANKS. If so, the member of the committee reporting the bill has one hour to close the debate after the previous question is

Mr. CAULFIELD. Is that so?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is so understood by the Chair. Mr. BANKS. At what time is this additional debate to be had?

It certainly should be before the vote on any of these amendments. Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the precise parliamentary condition of this matter. This bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] will suspend for one moment. The Chair would state, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the rule on page 170 of the Digest is as follows:

The right of the member reporting the pending measure to close the debate is never denied him, even after the previous question is ordered.

But if, after having occupied part of his hour in closing the debate, he moves the previous question, he is then only entitled to occupy the floor for the remaining portion of the hour.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was reported yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary. After the previous question was ordered, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAULFIELD,] my colleague on the committee, occupied a portion of his hour to close the debate and yielded a portion of it to me, and I spoke upon the bill. Then the previous question was reconsidered by a vote of the House; and the debate this morning has proceeded after the reconsideration. The right to close the debate upon this bill was exhausted yesterday. It is not now a measure reported from a committee to-day, but the right of the gentleman reporting it under the rule to close debate upon it was exercised on yesterday. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] exercised on yesterday. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] has fully exercised his right under the rule to close the debate on this bill. Therefore the right to close the debate after the previous question has been ordered is now entirely gone.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nobody appears to be asking further time to close the debate; consequently the Chair need not rule on

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, under the rule just read, has decided that the gentleman has no further time.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I entirely misunderstood the Chair. I understood him to rule, in response to the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] that I was entitled to an hour after the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the first impression of the Chair; but the rule on the subject is absolute, and the Chair cannot change it.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill and the various amendments as already given.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, my amendment has not been read. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that it is not before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. It was offered and was received as pending, but the reading was waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it was never presented to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. It was presented to the House, and it was agreed that it should be considered as pending, but its reading at the time was waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it was offered yesterday.

Mr. REAGAN. This morning I obtained leave to offer another amendment in lieu of that. It was considered as offered, though the reading of it at that time was waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk corrects the statement he before made to the Chair. The amendment is before the House, and will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following in lieu of section 1 of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentacky, [Mr. Brown:]

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States, postmaster, clerk, employé. Senator or Representative in Congress, or other person, to give, directly or indirectly, any money or any thing of value to any person or persons, or political party, or other organization or association, for the purpose or with the intent to assist or forward the interests of any person or persons, or political organization or party, in any election for any officer of the United States. And it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States, postmaster, clerk, or employé, Senator or Representative in Congress, or other person or persons, to solicit, ask, receive, or accept any gift or donation of any money or other valuable thing for the purpose or with the intent that the same shall be used to assist in orinfluence the election of any officer of the United States. And such officer, postmaster, clerk, Senator or Representative in Congress, or other person shall, on conviction of a violation of this act by any court of the United States having jurisdiction of such offense, be fined in any sum not exceeding $500 and shall be imprisoned for any time not exceeding six months. And any such officer of the United States, postmaster, clerk, employé, or Senator or Representative in Congress, shall, on conviction of a violation of the provisions of this act, be dismissed from such office or position of postmaster, clerk, employé, or Senator or Representative in Congress, shall, on conviction of postmaster, clerk, employé, or Senator or Representative in Congress.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas when he got consent to offer that amendment, and from whom? The RECORD shows nothing of the sort.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that this amendment was offered this morning.

Mr. REAGAN. It was bad enough for the gentleman reporting this bill [Mr. CAULFIELD] to refuse to allow me a moment to explain my amendment; it is still worse for him to desire to exclude the amendment after it has been received as pending.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Does the gentleman say that he obtained consent this morning to offer the amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. CAULFIELD. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair understands that this amendment was sent to the desk this morning in lieu of the amendment which the gentleman proposed yesterday to offer, as referred to in the RECORD. The House will now proceed to vote upon the several amendments in their order.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, after the word "demand," insert the words "or solicit;" so that it will read: "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand or solicit from any other person so employed," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the original bill.

Mr. BLAINE. That is an amendment to the second section. Had not the amendments better be read in the order in which they apply

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments are being voted on in the order in which they were offered.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Speaker decided a while ago that the bill was being considered by sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is aware of that.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I hope we shall take up the amendments in the order in which they apply to the bill. That is the uniform prac-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nearly all this proceeding has been going on by unanimous consent. The Chair, however, in view of the fact that the first step is to perfect the original bill, will take the amendments in the order suggested by the gentleman from Maine. The next question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Townsend,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

Provided, That any expenditure for election purposes allowed by the laws of any State shall not be construed as being affected by the provisions of this act.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, line 2, by inserting after the words "United States" the following words:

Or any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress.

And at the close of the section add:

And the contribution of money or other valuable thing as herein prohibited by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall subject the offender to the penalties herein prescribed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the reading of the section as it will read if thus amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons employed in the service of the United States, in any manner whatever, to contribute any money or other valuable thing to be used as an election fund or to aid in the expenses of any election or canvass for an election in any State, county, or district in the United States. And the contribution of money or other valuable thing as herein prohibited by any Senator, or Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall subject the offender to the penalties herein prescribed.

Mr. BLAINE called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and navs were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 129, nays 86, not voting 74; as follows:

Mr. HUNTER stated that his colleague, Mr. Cason, was absent on

Mr. MONROE stated that his colleague, Mr. Danford, was detained from the House by illness

Mr. FREEMAN stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. Cochrane; that otherwise he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. McCRARY stated that his colleague, Mr. Kasson, was necessarily absent from the House, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. FORT stated that Mr. Hoskins was unavoidably absent.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. Hoan's amendment.
Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Is a motion to recommit in order?
The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox in the chair.) It is not, the main question having been ordered.
The Clerk read Mr. Hoan's amendment, as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent voluntary contributions for the purpose of circulating documents or procuring public addresses for the purpose of giving information on questions of public interest.

Mr. HOAR. That comes in at the end of the second section. The SPEAKER pro tempore. So the Chair understands. The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 111.

Mr. HOAR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALKER, of New York, stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. MacDougall.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question next recurred on Mr. Goode's amendment, to come in at the end of section 3.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The same amendment has also been moved to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

That if any person, with a view to the election to or obtaining votes for the office of President, Vice-President, or the post of Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or to the appointment to any office or post of honor or emolument under the Government of the United States of himself or any other person, shall use force or duress by menace or violence to life, limb, property, or liberty, or shall commit bribery, or use money, property, or other thing of value corruptly to influence any elector, voter, officer, or other person in or in respect to any election or appointment to any such office or post, he shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and be imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case.

Mr. HAMILTON of New Jersey I understand that was offered as

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I understand that was offered as an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was offered as an amendment to the bill and also as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. It is perfectly inconsistent with the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Town-SEND, of Pennsylvania, to section 1 of the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided. That no expenditures for election purposes allowed by the constitution or laws of any State shall be construed as being within the provisions of this act.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] to the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Brown.] The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first section the following:
And the contribution of any money or valuable thing, as herein prohibited, by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall be deemed a misdemeanor and the offender on conviction shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the same.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Is that offered as an amendment to the substitute offered by myself?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I hope the House will vote it down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to hear the substitute read as it would be if this amendment were incorporated. Mr. BLAINE. My amendment comes in right at the end of the substitute.

Mr. BEEBE. I think it should be read before we are called upon to vote on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair directs the substitute to

The substitute was read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now let it be read as it will be if the amend-

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that my amendment may now be read, and that the Chair shall state where it comes in.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Will it be in order for me to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course not; you cannot do it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous

Mr. BEEBE. I would like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] will hear it read when it comes up for action by the House. Mr. BEEBE. I want to have it read now, to see whether it meets the point which the gentleman from Maine has in view.

Mr. BLAINE. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. BEEBE. I want to have it read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen have always the right to have amendments read for information. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] calls for the reading of his own.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course; but the Chair could not rule that a subsequent amendment to the substitute may be read while one is pending. That would be in the nature of debate. I do not object to its being read, but I do object to that ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled correctly. The first section of the substitute will first be read as it will be if the amendment of the gentleman from Maine is adopted.

The Clark read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That no officer or employé of the Government shall require or request, give to or receive from, any other officer or employé of the same or other person, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or other thing of value, for political purposes; and any such officer or employé who shall offend against the provisions of the act shall at once be dismissed from the service of the United States and also be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000 and imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case. And the contribution of any money or valuable thing, as herein prohibited, by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and the offender, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000 and imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the

Mr. BEEBE. I now call for the reading of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it may be read for information

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Chair think that the rules permit that to be read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the amendment may be read, and will overrule any former practice if it be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to its being read, but the rules

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to its being read, but the rules do not permit it.

Mr. GOODE'S amendment was again read.

Mr. BLAINE. Nobody can tell what that means. The other proposition is very plain. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine knows that no debate is in order.

Mr. BLAINE. It is as much so as that reading of this amendment for information.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. BLAINE's amendment, on a division by sound the Speaker pro tempore said that in the judgment of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. BLAINE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will take a division first.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; let the question be submitted to a division first.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 117. Mr. BLAINE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if the House understands that this amendment to the substithe rouse understands that this amendment to the tute is precisely the amendment already voted on.

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

Mr. BLAINE. That is not debate.

Mr. BEEBE. It is very plain. Everybody understands it.

Mr. BLAINE. That is for the Chair to decide.

Mr. TUCKER. We quite understand it.
Mr. BLAINE. I have addressed a parliamentary inquiry to the

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen can find out by making an examination at the Clerk's desk. The Chair is not bound after so many readings to give gentlemen that information.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Chair permit me to state to him that that is precisely the amendment which the House has already voted upon and adopted as an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine must observe the rules, or the Chair will have to read the rules on the gentleman. He would dislike to do that, because the gentleman is well informed upon them.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 107, not voting 80; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. FREEMAN said: Upon all questions relating to this bill I am saired with my colleague, Mr. Cochrane.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WADDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!" from both sides of the House.]
Mr. WADDELL. I insist upon my motion.
Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed.

The question recurred upon the amendment proposed to the substitute by Mr. Hoar.
Mr. CAULFIELD. Does not the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Goode] come first?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is taking the amendments according to the sections to which they relate, pursuing the same course with the substitute as with the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HOAR was read, as follows:

Provided, Nothing herein shall be construed to prevent voluntary contributions for the purpose of circulating documents or procuring public addresses for the purpose of giving information on questions of public interests.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have intelligence in our elections. Mr. HOLMAN. O! that is a subterfuge.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division there ves 91, noes 119.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] I understood that the yeas and nays were taken on this same proposi-sition when it was offered as an amendment to the bill, and therefore I withdraw the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the amendment is not agreed to. The next amendment was that offered by Mr. GOODE as an additional section to the substitute proposed by Mr. Brown, of Kentucky; and it was read, as follows:

That if any person, with a view to the election to or obtaining votes for the office of President, Vice-President, or the post of Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or to the appointment to any office or post of honor or emolument under the Government of the United States of himself or any other person, shall use force or duress, by menace or violence to life, limb, property, or liberty, or shall commit bribery, or use money, property, or other thing of value to influence any elector, voter, officer, or other person in or in respect to any election or appointment to any such office or post, he shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500, nor more than $3,000, and be imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case.

Mr. GOODE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Permit me one moment; nobody will vote against that amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and navs were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the

Mr. CAULFIELD. I submit that the roll-call had commenced and that the motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to state that the gentleman from Massachusetts made the motion in time.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw it.

During the call of the roll,
Mr. GOODIN said: My colleague, Mr. Brown, is detained from the House to-day on account of a death in his family; if present, he would vote "ay."
Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. Waldron, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."
Mr. LUTTRELL. My colleague, Mr. Wigginton, and Mr. Lane of Oregon, are both detained in their rooms on account of sickness;
if present they would vote "ay."
Mr. FREEMAN. I desire to state that I am paired upon this subject with my colleague, Mr. COCHRANE; otherwise I would vote "ay."
Mr. HOAR. I ask that by unanimous consent the names of those voting in the negative only be read over by the Clerk.

Mr. AINSWORTH. I move that the bill and amendment be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAINE. That motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to recommit is not in order pending the previous question.

Mr. AINSWORTH. Then I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] to the sub-

Mr. THORNBURGH and others objected.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the amendment cannot now be modified, the previous question having been ordered and being in process of execution.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I withdraw the amendment.
Mr. HURLBUT. That cannot be done.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only by unanimous consent.
Mr. HURLBUT. I object; we want a vote on it.
The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. REAGAN; and was a division it was not acreed to—avec 35 nose not counted.

Mr. BLAINE. The original bill contains the amendment which I offered [cries of "Order!"] and the substitute contains the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.] I think we had better have the yeas and nays upon the substitute as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I would rather have the original bill as amended;

Mr. SAYLER. I ask that I will take the substitute.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask that the substitute as amended be now read.

The Clerk then read the substitute as amended.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a great desire not to have the yeas and nays taken on this question, and I do not desire to factiously take up the time of the House. I will move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, and will be content to have the vote taken by a division on the substitute as amended.

The motion to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays was then agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I now withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The substitute, as amended, was then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, Mr. POPPLETON said: My colleague, Mr. Walling, is absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I move that the title of the bill be amended so Mr. CAULITELD. I move that the title of the bill be amended so as to read: "A bill to prevent the solicitation, contribution, or acceptance by any officer or employé of the Government of money, property, or other thing of value for political purposes."

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the title ought to be a little broader. The word "officer" does not embrace a member of this House or the Senate.

Mr. McCRARY. The proposed title does not cover the whole scope of the bill. The bill provides a penalty for any "person" who shall do certain things.

Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the proposed amendment of the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. CAULFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut, with an amendment; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of a joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith; in which concurrence was requested.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, at the expiration of the morning hour, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration and finally dispose of the resolution for the investigation of the Mississippi election.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 555) to amend section 856 of the Revised Statutes, to report the same adversely, and to move that it be indefinitely postponed. This bill provides, in respect of the accounts of marshals and district attorneys and clerks of the circular statements. the accounts of marshals and district attorneys and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States, that there shall be an appeal allowed to them from the decision of the accounting officers of the Treasury to the Attorney-General, whose determination shall be final. We are of the opinion that that is a piece of legislation that ought not to be resorted to. We think that on the whole it is much safer to leave it where it is and have the accounting officers of the Treasury the responsible and final auditors of accounts in respect of all branches of the public service.

The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire, reported it with amendments.

to retire, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 39) granting a pension to Frederick Youngblue, of Company I, Twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 610) granting a pension to Seth W. Homestead, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Julia Scroggin, widow of Humphrey Scroggin, late a soldier of the Georgia volunteers in the war of 1812, praying for a pension, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 641) granting a pension to Julia Scroggin.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Rice, widow of Marcus B. Rice, late a private in Company M, Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 280) to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships not before provided for," approved May 20, 1826, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a very large number of memorials presented yesterday by the Sena-tor from New York [Mr. Conkling] remonstrating against any proposed change in the method of paying pensions and against the transfer of the Pension Bureau to the War Department, have instructed me to report them back to the Senate and ask to be discharged from their further consideration and that the same be referred to the committee appointed to examine the several branches of the civil service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Pensions will be discharged from their further consideration, and the memorials will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2304) granting a pension to Philip J. Shaw, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 258) granting a pension to William H. H. Anderson, submitted on adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was pesteoned indefinitely.

and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BRUCE, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Flias Anderson, late of the Twenty-second Independent Battery Ohio Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 642) for the extension of the patent of John Thomas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 643) to prohibit the transportation of liquid nitro-glycerine and to regulate the transportation of dynamite; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WRIGHT. On the day Senate bill No. 72, fixing the salary of the President of the United States, was passed the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Christiancy] moved its reconsideration. If there be objection on his part, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. As I made the motion, I wish to say at this time that there are several Senators who desire to be heard upon the question, who are not in the Chamber. I made the motion more on account of those who had voted in the negative and for the purpose of giving them an opportunity to be heard, than because I wished to say anything upon the subject myself. As soon as the Senators are present who wish to speak upon the question, I will call up the mo-wish of the Senator from Michigan, especially if he feels that his obligations to others are such that he cannot consistently call up the motion at this time. I wished to call it up now, because I think it motion at this time. I wished to call it up now, because I think it due to the Senate and to the question that it should be disposed of; and I trust the Senator from Michigan will embrace the very earliest moment to call up the motion and get it out of the way. I therefore shall not insist upon it now; but I call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senator from Michigan, to the importance of having it disposed of. In view of the peculiar circumstances, I shall not press it now; but I trust at the very earliest moment the Senator will give it his attention, and get it before the Senate.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have had no intention of producing any delay by not calling up the motion. When I made the motion last week I expected it to be brought up the next day or the day after; but the Senate was thin, and I desire to have a full Senate, and especially to have present those who took an interest in the bill who wished to say something upon it before it finally passed from the consideration of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians.

The message also announced that the House had passed the follow-

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 295) to amend the act entitled "An act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation;" and

A bill (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the following bills having been presented to the President on the 10th of March, and not having been returned by him to the Senate within the ten days (Sundays excepted) prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORTON. If there is no further morning business, I ask the Senate to take up the unfinished business, hoping to get through with it very soon.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the considera-tion of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. MERRIMON. I now offer the amendment which I suggested the other day I would offer at the appropriate time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in section 2 of the bill, lines 7, 8, and 9, to strike out the words

The two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

And in lieu thereof to insert-

Shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities, recognized by, and in harmony with, the United States, as provided by the Constitution.

So that the section will read, if amended-

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of the electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by, and in harmony with, the United States, as provided by the Constitution.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I offer no apology for venturing to present some views of my own in reference to the important question under discussion. It is confessedly one of the most serious moment, surrounded by a great multiplicity of complications and perplexing doubts. If I shall be able in any degree to assist in removing such difficulties I am sure the Senate will be satisfied; at all events, I will have the consciousness of having endeavored to discharge an important public duty.

It is very much to be regretted that the provisions of the Constitu-tion in reference to the election of President and Vice-President are so general and so meager in their terms; and this regret is heightened by the fact that the debates in the convention which framed the Constitution on this particular matter, which have come down to us, are very limited, and not calculated to afford us any, or very little, light on the subject. Besides, there has been no official act or decision anywhere that is calculated to do so. Whenever action has been taken at all, (and this is an important fact to be kept in view in the course of what I have to say,) it has been taken without question and without debate; so that whatever has been done can scarcely be regarded in the light of precedent or authority binding in any degree the action or judgment of Congress.

The terms of the Constitution are very general, they are meager, upon the subject, and almost everything is left to implication, to construction and inference under the rules that govern us in the interpretation of instruments like the Constitution. I think I may say with confidence that we are left exactly in the condition of a court that has no prior lights in which to construe a constitutional instrument submitted to it. This being the case, it is important, it seems to me, and I shall take that course in what I am about to say, that we should take a survey of the whole subject of the election of Preswe should take a survey of the whole subject of the election of President and Vice-President under the Constitution and not confine our investigation to a single clause. In my judgment and in my view, in order to have a complete and satisfactory comprehension of the subject under discussion, it is essential that we shall consider particularly and accurately the clause of the Constitution immediately preceding that which has been discussed. Upon that rests the clause that has been debated. It is essential that we should understand the ground-work before we can understand thoroughly and accurately the superstructure.

The second clause of article 2 of the Constitution provides in these

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

This provision of the Constitution is one of those provisions which guarantees to and establishes an absolute right in the States, one to be exercised solely by and for the benefit of the State rather than for the benefit of the United States. It establishes a right and power in the State which no Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise which he Federal authority can compel the State to exercise the state of the Sta cise, which no Federal authority can in any way control or direct. It is as much a matter under the control of the State as the election of the chief magistrate of the State or the Legislature or the judiciary the chief magistrate of the State or the Legislature or the judiciary of the State. It is a matter that they have complete power to regulate and to determine as they will. The State is more interested in the subject—exercise of the right and power—than any other State or than the Federal Government. It is a right for the benefit of the particular State and by and through which the people may have a voice in the selection of Chief Magistrate of the National Government. The Constitution provides that the State shall participate in the election, and how its right shall be exercised through its legislative authority. It provides that the Legislature of the State may designate the manner of selecting electors to east the vote of the people tive authority. It provides that the Legislature of the State may designate the manner of selecting electors to cast the vote of the people of the State or of the State for President and Vice-President. The Legislature may provide that itself shall elect the electors who are to compose the electoral college and cast the vote. It may provide that the governor shall appoint them. It may provide that the supreme court of the State shall appoint them. It may provide that a commissioner shall appoint them. It may provide that the people of the State as a whole and by general ticket shall elect them; or it may provide that the people of each congressional district shall elect by districts.

This being a matter, I repeat, completely within the jurisdiction of the States through their legislative authority, Congress has no power to direct in that behalf at all. That being true, when the Legislature shall have acted, whether in one way or another, and an election shall take place or an appointment shall be made by the authority designated by the Legislature, neither Congress nor any Federal authority has any power or right whatever to inquire into the legality of such election or appointment. Why? Because it is a matter completely within the jurisdiction of the State. Suppose, for example, that according to the present prevailing custom in the several States a general election shall take place in a State and there shall be two political tickets before the people for election; that it shall appear by the final count of the popular vote that the democratic ticket shall have the majority, but the friends of the other ticket insist that the republican ticket really, in fact and in truth, apart from fraud, fraudulent and other unlawful considerations, have a majority. Suppose ulent and other unlawful considerations, have a majority. Suppose that should become a matter of great moment in the State, and not only in the State but that it should become a matter of the greatest moment to the nation, the election of President and Vice-President turning upon the vote in that State. Congress would have no right or power to interfere in any respect whatsoever to determine whether the one ticket or the other was elected. That is a matter with the State, and it is competent for the Legislature of the State to provide the proper means of contesting the election in that case. The State Legislature alone is vested with power to provide means and tribunals for contesting such election. nals for contesting such election.

to Congress that great frauds have been perpetrated by one party or the other; that votes have been bought by the score and by the thousand, and that force and intimidation have been used, that would be impertinent and vain; for it would be a matter clearly without the implication of Congress. It is a matter to be investigated conthe jurisdiction of Congress. It is a matter to be investigated, considered, and disposed of entirely by the State; and, if the State will provide no means to investigate and to settle fairly and justly as between contending parties, if it will not provide for a contest of such election, it is the folly of that State; it is the misfortune of that State. But, as I said, it would be perfectly competent for the State to provide a means of contest, just as the States provide means and tribunals of contest for the election of members to the Legislature, or the election of governor, or the election of any other officer. The point I make is that this is a matter completely within the jurisdiction of the State, and it remains there until the election takes place and the the State, and it remains there until the election takes place and the electoral college shall be organized in pursuance of law. After the election of electors has taken place or the appointment has been made, as may be provided by the Legislature of the State, and after any contest has been decided, should there be any provision in the State for a contest, then, under the law, the chief magistrate of the State gives to the person elected the certificate of election or appointment, which is the evidence of his right to sit and vote in and make part of the electoral college. The governor gives to each of the electors elected or appointed according to the law of the State a certificate, which is the evidence of his election, and, armed with that certificate, the electors who receive such certificate assemble together at the time and place prescribed by law and organize themselves into what is commonly called the electoral college of that State. When the electoral college is duly organized, then it is in condition to come in lawcommonly caned the electoral college of that State. When the electoral college is duly organized, then it is in condition to come in lawful contact with and to establish lawful, cognizable relations with the United States through Congress. And therefore, after the members of the electoral college—that is, the electors—have cast the vote one way or another, when the return of the vote shall come before Congress in the way and manner I will explain after a while, it is then, and not till then, competent for Congress to inquire whether the electoral college proceeded according to law. For example, suppose it should be suggested when the time shall come for Congress to count the vote—I shall show, I think, it has the power and the right and it is its duty so to do—and it should be suggested by a Senator, upon affidavit of some person or on any information of which Congress would take cognizance, that one, two, or three of the electors had been bribed to give the vote cast by them, or any other consideration touching the integrity of the vote cast by the electoral college should be suggested in a proper way, it would be perfectly competent for Congress to inquire into and settle the matter. It is not competent for Congress to inquire into the organization of the college, the manner of appointment or election, whether that was accomplished by fraud or by other unlawful means; that is for the State; but the college must be established according to the laws of the State, and then, after that, it is competent for Congress to inquire into the action of the college, in order to see whether that was fair and just and lawful, and in that respect it may become of the very gravest moment that Congress should inquire whether the votes of the electors had been bought for the purpose of electing a particular candidate. It is like the case of the election of a United States Senator. Congress is like the case of the election of a United States Senator. Congress has no power to go into the State of North Carolina, for example, when a Senator-elect from that State, or one purporting to have been elected by its Legislature, shall make application for admission here, to inquire whether two, three, four, or a dozen members of the Legislature were elected by fraudulent means or unlawfully in any respect. That is a matter within the jurisdiction of the State authorities, within the jurisdiction of the Legislature; and when the Legislature within the jurisdiction of the Legislature; and when the Legislature decides, whether its decision be right or wrong, there is the end of the matter, and Congress has no jurisdiction to inquire into it. gress can have no jurisdiction for any such purpose. It must take the Legislature of the State as it is ascertained and established under the constitution and laws of the State. But when such Senator comes here and asks to be admitted, it is competent for the Senate, coming thus in relation with the Legislature of the State under the Constitution of the United States, to inquire whether the applicant bought one, two, three, or a dozen votes to secure his election. Nay, they not only have the power to do so, but it is the duty of the Senate to do so. Just so in the case where the electors comprising the electoral college Just so in the case where the electors comprising the electoral college are elected or appointed, according to the laws of the State, and when the college has been duly organized and proceeds to cast the vote, if it shall be alleged that fraud was perpetrated by the college thus proceeding, it is not only the right of Congress, but it is the duty of Congress, and one it cannot in conscience, if it would, evade, to inquire whether such fraud was perpetrated.

This part of my argument is not immaterial; it is very material as the distribution of the conscience of th tending to show how rights and powers and duties spring up under the provisions of the Constitution, which are so meager in their terms the meaning of which we must ascertain and understand by inference, implication, and construction.

I trust those who do me the honor to pay attention to what I am saying will keep in view this fact: that it is the duty of Congress or the authority which shall count the votes for President and Vice-President, if it shall be suggested that there was fraud, to look into it, to try the question, and see and determine as the right may be, because, as this is material, this fact goes far toward showing that the President of the Senate is not adapted in the exercise of his powers to count the vote and determine important questions connected with such count.

I come now, Mr. President, to discuss the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, which, as I said in my opening remarks, rests upon the clause of the second article which I have just undertaken to expound. So much of the twelfth article of the amendment as is material for my purpose is in these words:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and indistinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

These last are very material words, as will appear by and by.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

I want to call attention now particularly to the manner in which the electoral college, the State, and the people of the State, come in connection and contact with Congress. Is it not manifest that there must be some means by which whosoever shall count the electoral vote can see that the electoral college was indeed the lawful college? It is not expected, it cannot reasonably be expected, that Congress can take knowledge of it judicially or officially and rest satisfied with that; there must be lawful evidence to that end, evidence provided by law. The Constitution implies by every rule of reason and construction that there must be a means of evidence—muniments—by which it shall appear to Congress, the counting power, that there was a college duly ascertained and established, and that the college did act. Congress in the past has not been unmindful upon that subject, for it has provided—it was originally provided by the act of 1792—in the Revised Statutes, section 136, as follows:

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required, by the preceding section, to meet.

That clause provides for the evidence by which the elector shall know that he is an elector and a member of the electoral college, and by which Congress as the authority to count shall lawfully know that he was an elector. Now see how the relations—contact—is formed, fixed, and established by proper evidence—muniments—between the electoral college and through it between the State and the Congress, or the counting power, whatever that may be. This is yet further provided for by section 133 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

The electors shall make and sign three cer'ificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors—

These are material words-

One of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

That certificate of the election of the elector is material; it is material to show that he is an elector, and has a right to a seat in the college, and to participate in the college as a member; but it is not only material for that purpose, it is material for the further purpose that the counting authority, whether it be the President of the Senate or whether it be Congress, may see that he was elected or appointed according to the laws of the State in which he proposed to vote for President and Vice-President. That is the means; that is the evidence; that is the connecting link between the State and the counting power; and it is through and by means of that that the jurisdiction of Federal authority attaches, to the end that proper action in that behalf may be taken. Through and by the means so provided the State, the people of the State, and the Government of the United States come into conjoint and harmonious action.

What is the next thing to be done after the vote is cast by the electoral college? It were vain that the college should assemble and cast the vote if no means were provided by which it could be delivered to some proper, lawful, constitutional authority to compare and count the vote, to the end that it might be seen who was elected President and who was elected Vice-President. The Constitution provides how that communication shall be made, in these words:

shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States—

That is the place, the general place, to which the return is to be remitted. Now mark the words that follow those; they are—directed to the President of the Senate.

Why "directed to the President of the Senate?" Is there any peculiar function in his office that makes him the very appropriate person to deposit it with? Is there anything about his person, or his character, or his official position or character, that makes him an appropriate person over any other officer of the Government for such purpose? How is he better qualified for the discharge of this high trust than the Chief Justice, or the Supreme Court, or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or the Attorney-General, or any of the other executive officers? On the contrary, there are grave considerations why he is an inappropriate person for that purpose; for, as is manifest, and as has been shown here, the President of the Senate may be one of the very parties whose right may be in question and to be examined and decided. His right to be elected as President of the United States may be the question involved. His right to be elected as Vice-President may be the question involved. Surely in such a case he would above all others be the least fit to take charge of the returns, unless there were some special reason why he should do so. Then, besides, he is but one man. He is more liable to be entrapped, to be deceived, to be misled by one consideration or another, infinitely more so, than the Supreme Court, more so than the Chief Justice, because he has no motive to expect that he is to be President. It is possible that he might be a candidate, but the Supreme Court as a body would be the infinitely more proper place to deposit this vote than the President of the Senate. The debates in the convention that framed the Constitution do not show, any official action taken or decision that has been made since the adoption of the Constitution do not show, anything which points him out as the appropriate, the essential depositary of the returns of the election any more than any other officer of the Government; and there are the considerations suggested, and perhaps others that I have not adverted to, which disqualify, unfit him to be charged with so grave a matter. In view of these considerations I do maintain, with all respect to everybody who contends otherwise, that it is absurd in reason and law, by inference, by construction to charge him with the high power and right to receive and count the vote for President and Vice-President.

There is another consideration pertinent to be considered here. Why were the returns required to be sent to the President of the Senate? Why does the Constitution use the words "directed to the President of the Senate?" If it was contemplated that the Vice-President should count the vote, why did it not say so? It was not contemplated that the Vice-President should have charge of the returns at all, but it was in his character as President of the Senate, and as President of the Senate alone. Besides, there might be no Vice-President; there might only be a President pro tempore of the Senate, and then they are sent to him. But there was a motive for using the words "directed to the President of the Senate." a reasonable motive, a logical motive; and what was it? The Senate is the higher branch of Congress, and the President of the Senate is the higher presiding officer in Congress, and by courtesy he has precedence in place and privilege wherever the two presiding officers of Congress are brought in contact in their official capacity. The convention had to provide some one to whom should be sent the returns of the electoral vote so that they might be properly counted and the result of the election determined, and as I shall show that Congress was the appropriate body to count it, where else could the returns be so well or appropriately sent to be laid before Congress as to the chief presiding officer in Congress, to wit, the President of the Senate? It was provided that the electoral returns should be sent to the President of the Senate as the most appropriate, the most direct, the most reasonable, the most orderly channel through which to bring the electoral colleges, and the States through the electoral colleges, in connection and contact with Congress, the counting authority of the electoral vote. That was the purpose, and in my view none other.

It does seem to me that one, looking with the pure light of reason at the surrounding circumstances of this whole matter, cannot doubt that such was the purpose. If such was not the purpose, I ask this question, why was it provided, after he is charged with the returns, that he should be further charged in express terms to do a particular act, to wit, to open the returns in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the last and most important duty of counting the vote devolved upon him by implication and inference? Can any reason be assigned for such a strange and illogical provision as that? It seems to me not. It was not intended that he should have any absolute control of the returns. Though they may have come to his possession the next day after the vote had been cast, he has no right to open them at his will and anywhere. He is to keep control of them; he is to keep custody of them, and to open them, not when he will, not where he will, not to make any decision about them whatsoever; but at a particular time prescribed and in a particular place he is to open them just like he opens any other communication sent to Congress through the President of the Senate. When messages come to Congress addressed to the President of the Government or another, or when a memorial comes to the Senate through the presiding officer, what does he do? By reason of the fact that it is addressed to him, or that it is delivered to him, he holds it until he comes into the presence of the Senate. In the presence of the Senate he does not deliver it sealed up. We never saw the presiding officer here deliver a message, or any document, to the Senate sealed up. He opens it, and having opened it to identify it, to see that it is the paper sent to the Senate, he then delivers it to the Senate. He says: "The Chair lays before the Senate the following executive message," or "this memorial." or whatever paper he is requested as President of the Senate to present, and to the end that the Senate may get jurisdiction of the officer in Congress, and it is provided that he shall open the returns and open them only in the presence of the Senate and House. Why should he open them? For a good reason; to identify them as returns; to see that they are that which the law charges him to lay before the Senate and House of Representatives; and then by such means the Congress has complete jurisdiction, and his authority, as the means, as the officer through which the Congress takes jurisdiction, is over, except as he shall be directed in that behalf by proper order, or resolution, or act of the Senate and House of Representatives.

I asked the question a while ago, was there anything peculiar about his office that fitted him for this duty of counting the electoral vote? I endeavored to show that there was not, and that there are grave reasons why he should not be charged with any such power. Now, sir, I put the pertinent question, is there any power appropriate to that end but Congress? The Congress represents the sovereignty of the American people; it represents the sovereignty of the people en masse through the House of Representatives; it represents the sovereignty of the people as composing States, through the Senate. All power in the Federal Government, the aggregated, the absolute power of the National Government, is vested in Congress, except in so far as certain powers of government are limited to the executive and to the judicial departments of the Government by the Constitution. All power is in the Senate and House of Representatives with the limitations I have mentioned. In the absence of any express provision of the Constitution or necessary implication of the Constitution, (and it is not pretended that there is any in this case,) I ask the question again, is there any power as appropriate to count this electoral vote and determine all questions in connection with it, as the Congress representing the sovereignty of the American people as one nation, en masse, through the House of Representatives, and as composing States through the Senate? Sir, it is important in another view of sound policy and reason. Would it be possible to corrupt three hundred Representatives? Would it be as easy to corrupt three hundred Representatives? Would it be possible to corrupt three hundred Representatives? Would it be possible to corrupt three hundred Representatives? Would it be possible to corrupt three hundred Representatives? Would it be possible to corrupt the Congress as to corrupt one single officer, or the Supreme Court, or the Chief Justice, or one officer whomsoever he might be? The aggregate wealth of this country could not be practic

But there is another consideration why Congress is the appropriate power, and the law fixes it there, and that is this: Congress are responsible directly and indirectly to the people, the House of Representatives more particularly. The House of Representatives more particularly. The House of Representatives are elected directly by the people. They are responsible to them by their election every two years. What better tribunal to effectuate the popular will in a proper way as charged by the Constitution and law? The Senators are responsible to the people indirectly through the Legislatures of the States. It is believed by some statesmen, and I believe the doctrine has been acted upon by some political parties in this country, that the Legislature of a State has a right to instruct a Senator how he shall cast his vote on a particular question, and if he does not so, then to ask him to resign his place. At all events, he is responsible to the people of his State through the State Legislature every six years. The Supreme Court is not responsible, and the President of the Senate is not responsible to the people. He is in no sense dependent upon them; he is above them, and out of their way and reach.

I submit that these are grave considerations going to support the

I submit that these are grave considerations going to support the legal, logical, and necessary implication contained in this provision of the Constitution that the Congress is the proper authority to count the electoral vote.

There is one other consideration which I will mention here in connection with the presiding officer. The Senate has decided that it has power to remove the presiding officer at will when there is no Vice-President. How easy it would be when the next electoral vote is to be counted, if it should turn out that the prevailing party in the Senate should apprehend that the presiding officer would not do their will—I make no intimation of any such purpose on the part of any-body, but only make the suggestion to illustrate the force of my argument—how easy it would be for the majority to remove the presiding officer and appoint a supple tool to take the responsibility to do the lawless, wicked work of party! The framers of the Constitution were too intelligent and rational to make any such provision, or to contemplate that any such thing should transpire in this country. To say that, by implication and inference from the provisions of the Constitution to which I have adverted, the President of the Senate is charged with power to count the electoral vote, is to contravene all rules of construction, the reason of the thing, and sound policy, as I have endeavored to make plain.

Having thus shown, as we must be directed and governed by implication and inference, that reason and sound policy force us to the conclusion that Congress should be the power to count the electoral vote, let us see where the law fixes the power by its terms and necessary implication. It is provided that the presiding officer, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates, and then it is further provided that "the votes shall then be counted." Counted by whom? By the President of the Senate? Surely not. It is provided in express terms that he shall open the returns. Why, I repeat, this the most important duty left to inference? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] the other day, I thought put this argument with tremendous power. He called upon every lawyer to say, in the absence of any other provision and express words, to what authority was assigned the counting of the votes by that express provision. He insisted that, per force of this provision, the Congress, and Congress alone, was charged with the power; that by no rule of law could any other body or officer be charged with it; that intuitively the legal mind so assigned the power. He argued that it shocked the legal mind to contend otherwise. His argument impressed me forcibly. I concurred then most heartily and without hesitation—and reflection has only strenthened my conviction—that it is assigned to Congress. Why? Because it did not charge the President of the Senate to do it, but it did to do another thing. It did not charge the Supreme Court to do it; it did not charge any other functionary to do it; and in the absence of any such provision or charge, by the operation and the force and effect of the Constitution and legal principle ex vi termini, Congress is charged with that power. Congress is charged with every power of government unless it be lodged somewhere else by express terms or by necessary implication. In the absence of such provision it fixes it there inevitably. So that it follows, by the necessary fact of the express provision of the Constitution as well as necessary implication and by every argument founded upon sound and rational policy, that Congress has the power to count the vote and no other power can do it, and because Congress is thus charged therefore Congress cannot delegate its power to the Supreme Court, or to commissioners, or to the President of the Senate or any other power on earth. It is a duty that the Congress is as completely and thoroughly charged with as it is to pass a revenue law or any other act of legislation. It is fixed there. They cannot delegate it, however they m

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Stevenson] argued ingeniously and with much ability, the other day, to show the contrary of what I have advocated; and instead of resting their argument, as I humbly conceive, upon their own reason and a clear and critical discussion of the provisions of the Constitution, they relied greatly upon what they treated as precedents and speeches which had been made by various distinguished men in the past. Now, sir, with all respect and deference, I do insist that there is no precedent to sustain such a view as they held and contended for, and there is no precedent which contravenes the view of the Constitution which I have been presenting. Take the authority insisted upon by the Senator from Maryland. Before the Constitution went into operation, and in order to put it into operation, the convention that framed it passed an order providing—

That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

I have to say of this action on the part of the convention that it preceded the organization of the Government; it was an order passed by the convention in order to put the new Government into operation; it therefore cannot be regarded as setting a precedent for proceedings under the Constitution; but there is more than that. It does not provide that he—the President of the Senate—shall count the votes; it provides—that is the legal effect—that he is to be the presiding officer for that occasion, that he is to be the officer for the purpose of the count then to be made, and for no other purpose or occasion; and therefore, if a question had been raised, as I have shown a question might be raised, as to whether the electoral college had acted honestly and fairly and lawfully, I take it that Congress on that occasion would not have allowed Mr. Langdon to decide that question. The convention did not direct that he should count the votes; it directed that for a particular purpose, the opening and counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, he should be the presiding officer; he should be the means through which the electoral college would come in contact with Congress. That is all this provides; that is all the effect and consequence that can properly be assigned to that action of the convention.

Then, to show, furthermore, that the Congress did assert its power, let us see what it did do in that behalf. The Senate directed Mr. Ellsworth to proceed to the House of Representatives and notify the House that the Senate was ready to proceed, in conjunction with the House of Representatives, to count the electoral vote. The entry on the Journal reads:

The Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty.

That is, to count the electoral vote. He informed them also—
That the Senate have appointed one of their members, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

That is, for the purpose of making a list of the votes.

The Senate and House of Representatives at that very moment recognized their right and their power in that behalf, for in counting the first electoral vote they appointed tellers. Tellers for what? To count and compare the vote when it should be opened by Mr. Langdon. If the Constitution charged Mr. Langdon, as is contended, with counting the votes, and if the Senate and House of Representatives were merely there as spectators and witnesses, what right had they to appoint tellers, what right had they to do anything in that behalf but to sit there merely as spectators and witnesses?

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the clerk who records my vote at a State election count that vote?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir. Mr. STEVENSON. Then the tellers are merely to record what the presiding officer does. The Senator attempts to escape the force of the argument that a President of the Senate was elected to count the votes because the Government had not then been organized. Could not the House and Senate have then counted at that time as well as at any other time? And if it was a constitutional obligation on them, as is now argued by the Senator, to count that vote, why should they have allowed the President of the Senate to count it?

Mr. MERRIMON. For the plain reason that the Constitution provided no means to bring the electoral college and the Senate and House of Representatives in connection with each other. It had provided no means whatsoever to that end, and the convention in the exercise of supreme power in that respect saw fit to provide how it should be done on that occasion, conforming their action to the provision of the Constitution which was to go into effect from and after that time.

But, further, if he was charged with power to count the vote and it was necessary to have tellers or a clerk to do the clerkly work of counting—adding up—the vote, what right had the Senate and House of Representatives to appoint them? Was it within their jurisdiction to appoint? That was a matter within the power and discretion of the President of the Senate, as they contend, and if he needed any persons to aid him in counting the vote, it was his right and his duty to appoint them. But Mr. Langdon did not assert the right and did not exercise the right to do so, but it was proposed by the Senate and by the House of Representatives that they should each appoint a teller, and they did appoint tellers, and the tellers counted the vote. And thus the Senate and House on that the first occasion were not mere spectators and witnesses; they exercised power in connection with the count of the vote; and if any question had arisen, who can say they would not have insisted on deciding it? Suppose it had then been suggested that a return was forged, does any one think that the Congress would have allowed Mr. Langdon to decide the question whether it was or not? I do not think so.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask him where he finds anything about tellers in that original count; whether they were not appointed to sit at the Clerk's desk, and that

Mr. MERRIMON. If my friend is going to "stick in the bark" that way, I stand corrected. The language of the entry is that he informed them also-

That the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared.

Mr. WHYTE. "As they shall be declared."
Mr. MERRIMON. "Submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose." I submit to everybody in all candor whether that is not the exercise of a power on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives which goes to show that they claimed authority in that behalf. I submit they had no such power, if the view contended for by the Senators from Maryland and Kentucky is correct. It was within the power and jurisdiction of the President of the Senate to appoint those persons to sit at the table and take a list of the votes. The fact that Conto sit at the table and take a list of the votes. The fact that Congress asserted the power makes it a precedent to show that such power has been exercised by Congress and may do so on all proper occasions, treating the President of the Senate as their official organ. At the next counting of the electoral vote the record shows that-

At the next counting of the electoral vote the record shows that—
The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives that a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President.

Mr. King, from the joint committee appointed the 6th February, instant, reported, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock; that one person be appointed a teller, on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, and that the result shall be declared and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be decemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

So that at the second counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President the Senate and House of Representatives did exercise power, did exercise control, did appoint tellers—not persons to sit at the Clerk's desk to make a list—but did appoint tellers; so that so far as that goes as a precedent at all it goes to support the argument I have submitted.

But, sir, as I said a moment ago-and if any Senator knows to the contrary I should be glad to be corrected-whatever has been done contrary I should be glad to be corrected—whatever has been done in connection with the counting of the electoral vote in the past has been done by toleration, without question and without debate. If there is a solitary exception to that rule, it is the case in which, in 1857, Mr. Mason, the then Presiding Officer of the Senate, would not allow a question to be raised as to whether the vote of Wisconsin was lawful or not, on a motion to reject the vote. He honestly assumed to himself the great power to decide that all objections were out of order and would not allow debate. But history shows, and it is within the recollection of Senators here now, that the Senate was dissatisfied, and the House was dissatisfied, and that, if the election of President and Vice-President had then turned upon the vote of Wisconsin, his act might, it probably would, have produced a revolution. According to the strength of reasoning and justice and right, and in the provision of the Constitution, in my judgment, and with all due respect to his memory, he exercised an unwarranted power on his part. I make no question that he did it in good faith and under a high conviction of duty.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will state to the Senator that Mr. Mason, who then presided, expressly said at the time that he claimed no such

Mr. MERRIMON. But he exercised it.
Mr. STEVENSON. He said he did not exercise it; he merely acted under that duty confided to him of declaring the vote returned.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no doubt that Mr. Mason did exactly what he thought was right and honest. I do not question his integrity, but I question the wisdom and the lawfulness of his view and his action, and it was questioned in both branches of Congress, and the action, I take it, would not have been allowed to stand if the election for President and Vice-President had turned upon the electoral vote of Wisconsin. That is the point I make. So, I repeat, there is no precedent, where there was a question and debate made, that contradicts the argument that I have submitted here to-day.

The honorable Senators from Maryland and Kentucky have cited speeches made by distinguished Senators and others in the past. What are they? Only the opinions, and often hasty opinions, expressed by men of distinction. That is all; their words are no authority; and they have not stopped to cite opinions held by distinguished men on the other side. They were assembled just like we are; they were arguing the question as we are; and their opinion was worth no more than ours, except as some of them might be more in-telligent and able than some of us. I could point to the convincing arguments of able and distinguished men, delivered during this de-bate; they will probably be pointed to in the future, in the line of the view that I have been advocating; but what does that amount to, except as an expression of opinion? What does my argument to-day amount to, except as an expression of opinion? It is no preceding dent, it is my opinion and my argument; it is to be measured by its strength and its power, if it have any. If it has power in it, if it has strength in it, if it has convincing reasoning in it, it will control the mind of somebody here to-day, or somebody in the next Congress, or in the next age; but its weight as a precedent amounts to nothing. Just so as to the arguments cited by the Senators to support the view they have insisted upon. They were simply the opinions-some of them expressed hastily in a running debateof Senators or others,

There is no official precedent, there is no official act that contravenes the view that I have insisted upon here to-day, or the power or right of the Senate to pass this bill, or one substantially like it, providing for and regulating the counting of the electoral vote. Not only are the precedents wanting, but the opinions of learned commentators are wanting. The only one that has expressed himself at any length at all upon the subject, so far as I now remember, is Chancellor Kent. He was a great lawyer, and fit and worthy and able to express an opinion on this subject; and if he expressed an opinion, I should regard it as entitled to very great weight. I venerate his memory, and I have the profoundest respect for his learning, his ability, and his opinions as a great judge and law-writer. But so far as he expressed any opinion in this respect—and it is strange that he did not say more—it goes to show, meager as it is, that he recognized as existing in Congress a power to pass some bill like that which it is proposed to pass now, regulating the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President; for he says that, "in the absence of legislative authority," he presumes that it would be the duty of the President of the Senate to count the votes. That word "presume" is a word which implies a very dubious state of mind; it intimates that he scarcely thought so; he presumes so, because the President of the Senate had done it before. But his opinion was not founded upon reason or any construction of the Constitution, or any language in the Constitution, or any interpretation of it, or any inference from its provisions. His opinion, so far as it goes for anything, in my judgment, goes to show that he contemplated that such a power did exist, and that Congress might when it saw fit, when the condition of the country and the progress of the Government required it, exercise the

Mr. President, we well know that many of the provisions of the Constitution have lain dormant, and act after act has been tolerated, and without question and without argument, which when scrutinized could not be tolerated if the touch-stone of truth were applied. We find ourselves compelled every day to take some new view, to call into action some new provision of the Constitution in many of its features. Why, sir, the late war has developed views of the Constitution that would have startled the men who framed it, that would have amazed the most advanced statesman before the late war; and it is the province of Congress now to scrutinize in cooler times whether a proper construction was put upon it. What was done will be cited as precedents; but some of these will not be regarded as good precedents; they will only be regarded as good precedents so far as they conform to reason and a proper construction of the Con-Many of its provisions are to be settled in the futuresettled differently from the action of the past, where the action of the past went unquestioned at the time. The decision of a court is only valuable as a precedent where the question was squarely presented and argued before the court, and when the court considered it, and upon mature deliberation decided it. In such a case the precedent is worth something, it commands respect and confidence. If we shall pass this bill, or one substantially like it, after this long de-bate and after it shall have been debated in the House, and the bill shall have become a law, it will be a precedent, because, upon due consideration of all the issues raised, the whole subject will have been discussed and examined pro and con in every light, and the proper authority to decide it will have come to a conclusion and taken action, and thus a precedent for all time will have been established. But if the bill shall not pass, if it shall not become a law, future

Congresses will be left to grope along, as we are doing to-day, and to settle the matter as their judgments may lead them.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that the bill under consideration provides, in the interest of the States, that "no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses." If but one return shall come, it shall be counted; it shall be counted without reference to its irregularity, its imperfections, unless both branches of Congress shall concur in the opinion that it ought not to be counted. Suppose the electoral vote from North Carolina is sent, and it shall be suggested that it is a forgery; the Senate and House of Representatives have the right to inquire whether it be a forgery, they have the means of inquiring whether it be a forgery; they can send out a committee composed of Senators and members of the House to take testimony and ascertain whether it was indeed a forgery; or suppose some formal defect is suggested, they have the right to inquire into that, and debate the matter. Nevertheless, the vote shall be counted, unless both branches of Congress shall concur in rejecting it. It may be that there are defects about it that one House of Congress think would warrant Congress in rejecting it, and the other House of Congress may be of a different opinion. In such a case the vote must be counted. This is a liberal provision of the bill, and it seems to me a wise one. It is true Congress may decide against the vote of a State and reject it; but any power—the President of the Senate—might likewise decide against it if charged with the power to count the vote.

Now I put this view: Would not the American people be better satisfied that the Senate and House of Representatives should decide a question of that sort than that the President of the Senate, one manand perhaps he interested, should decide it? What other tribunal within the whole range of tribunals in this Government is so well calculated to decide that question as Congress? What other tribunal could decide it more to the satisfaction of the people of the United States than the Congress—the Senate and House of Representatives? And when both branches concur in making such a decision rejecting a vote, can anybody doubt that the American people would submit quietly and cheerfully to a decision so made? The decision would be made by a body representing the sovereignty and the will of the The great mass of them would be content, whatever their

I say, therefore, sir, that the provision is wise, it is in the interest of the States, it is in the interest of the people, the vote will be counted unless both branches of Congress shall concur in rejecting it, in which case it ought to be rejected, and the proper tribunal will have rejected it, and according to reason and theory and the Constitution it ought to be rejected, and therefore the people will be satisfied with it at all events, and better satisfied than if it had been rejected by the President of the Senate or any other tribunal whatever.

But, Mr. President, another case is provided for. The second section of the bill provides-

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses, when assembled to count the votes, and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

In my opinion the last clause of that section ought to be stricken out and the amendment which I have offered ought to be substituted, and for reasons which I now propose to submit. According to the Constitution and the law, the State governments are at all times in official and harmonious and lawful relations with the Federal Government, and the Congress and the President and all official authorities of the United States take official notice of such harmonious rela-We are bound to know such a state of things, whether we actually know it or not. A judge is bound to know the law whether he knows it or not. He takes judicial notice of the law. Many things that come within his jurisdiction he is bound to know, whether he does or not. Just so in reference to the relations between the State and the Federal Government. The authorities of the Federal State and the Federal Government. The authorities of the Federal Government take official notice of the proper lawful tribunals of the several States. But it is suggested, suppose a state of things where there is confusion in a particular State and there are two classes of persons purporting to be the officers of the State and to administer.

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the Government under which they are its government, and each class sends up an electoral vote so that there are two electoral votes for President and Vice-President; what is to be done in that case? I say that that vote must be counted which is properly authenticated by the certificate of that governor who administers the government of the State in harmony with the Government of the United States. The President recognizes the governor of North Carolina; the authorities of the Federal Government—the Congress and all other authorities—are in proper relations with him; they have been in constitutional relations with him; they recognize him to-day; they recognize him at the time the electoral vote comes, at the time the electoral vote is to be counted, and it appears by the signature of that executive and by the seal of the State in conjunction with it that the electoral college was elected by the law of the State as he represents it. Then that vote so authenticated is to be

But it may be said that simply official notice of the existence of State officers is sometimes impracticable, and positive action must be taken.
What then shall be done? It is within the power of the President under the act of 1795 to recognize the lawful government of the State; and, when he recognizes a particular governor and a particular class of officers as the lawful governor and officers of the State, that is the State government in harmony with the United States, and the electoral vote sent forward by that authority under the amendment that I have submitted would be counted, or, if Congress had recognized a governor, then the electoral vote sent forward and accompanied by his certificate would be counted.

But there is another power above that of the President. His power to recognize a State government is derived from the act of 1795. He derives his authority from that, and from that alone. His act is subject to the review of Congress. Congress is the last power to determine what is the true and lawful State government. Congress may by concurrent resolution, and perhaps in other ways, recognize the governor and the other officers who represent the true State government. When Congress has thus recognized them by express resolution or in any other way as a Congress, the electoral ticket sent forward by the government as administered by such officers is the electoral vote which should be counted. That is the government which the people of the United States will be satisfied with, that is the lawful government. ment. I say they will be satisfied with it because the Constitution charges Congress, whenever it shall be necessary for it to determine the relations of the Federal with the State authorities, to decide it, and when they decide a matter thus within their jurisdiction the people submit to it just as they would to a decision made by the Supreme Court touching a matter that came completely within its jurisdiction, and cheerfully. If they will not, the government would be at an end and the people but a mob.

That is so, Mr. President, according to the terms of the Constitution, and a reasonable view of it, and it has been so expressly decided; and I take pleasure—I have done it before on former occasions and I do it again—in calling to the attention of the Senate the language of the Supreme Court in this respect. I believe that we ought to talk more and know more about the relations between the States and the Federal Government. We cannot study them too much. I do not believe in the idea that we are not one people under the Constitution. I believe that this is a nation. I believe that the States make up the Union; that they are of the Union and the Union is of the States; that each is made an organ for the other and supports the other, and there is no hostile element anywhere existing, there is no hostility or adverse right; and wherever hostility appears, it is because the machinery is not properly adjusted and is not properly operating; it is because of maladministration somewhere. This Government is imperium in imperio; it is a National Government and State governments combined. Our system is a mixed government, composed of State and Federal Governments. The National Government within its sphere is absolute and sovereign; the States within their sphere are absolute and sovereign; but the whole make up one Government, one system; they operate together like a nicely-adjusted piece of machinery. North Carolina is of the Union and for the Union; the Union is for North Carolina. They co-operate each with the other, and each makes up a part of the machinery of the other. The people of the Union and the Government of the Union are interested in every official act done in North Carolina, and the people of North Carolina are interested in every official act done by the people of the Union in every State, and by the authorities of the Union, under the Constitution and the laws. This is one system of government; it is one whole; and the only difficulty that Senators and statesmen can have is in ascertaining how the machinery shall be kept in harmonious action, and that is the question, in the respect that we have under discussion, that I am trying to throw some light upon now.

I call attention to what the Supreme Court say as to the manner of ascertaining which is the true government and what is the power to determine that question in an emergency like the one suggested and like others I might mention. In Luther vs. Borden, Chief Justice Taney, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitu-tional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long—

This was the Rhode Island case-

long enough to bring the matter to this issue; and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts.

So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely, and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that "in case of any insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature and who is the governor before he can act. The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must, of necessity, decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can per ernments in the respect referred to.

Mr. President, in the case provided for in the second section of this bill, I say that the President of the United States having recognized the proper authorities of the State, the electoral ticket sent forward the proper authorities of the State, the electoral ticket sent forward by those authorities must be counted, unless Congress shall reverse his action and declare that another body of officers represent the true authority of the State; and in the contingency that Congress shall so declare, then the electoral vote sent by that class of officers must be counted. I insist that the proposed amendment to the bill is wise for this reason: It relieves Congress, and parties in Congress at the time, from getting into squabbles about party ascendency and party success; it compels Congress in the count to accept the recognized government. government.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him?
Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.
Mr. MORTON. While agreeing with most that has been said by the Senator from North Carolina, I desire to call his attention to the particular effect of the amendment which he proposes, so that he may answer the objection that I suggest, if it be an objection. He proposes to strike out all after the word "which," in line 7 of section 2, and insert a clause to make the section read:

And that return from such State shall be counted which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States as provided by the Constitution.

The objection I suggest to the amendment offered by the Senator is, first, that this undertakes to prescribe a rule by which the two Houses shall decide a question arising upon two returns. Congress would be bound to decide it that way if there was nothing else in it. If there are two returns, and one comes certified by the recognized government of the State and the other comes from a pretended government, if there be no other objection, that which comes from the recognized government of the State must be counfed. If Congress should recognized nize the spurious government or should fail to recognize the only gov ernment in the State, of course it would be a gross breach of its duty. I assume, therefore, that this amendment attempts to establish a rule I assume, therefore, that this amendment attempts to establish a rule by which Congress must be governed anyhow. But the question is whether itdoes not go too far. It says, "that return which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States as provided by the Constitution" shall be counted. Now, suppose there are two returns, one from the recognized government and one from a pretended government. Of course, as between the two, we must take that which comes from the recognized government. But are we bound to take that return?

Mr. MERRIMON. We ought to be.

Mr. MORTON. So far as the government of the State is concerned we ought to be; but are we bound to take that return? We should be under this amendment. It may turn out that the return which is be under this amendment. It may turn out that the return which is sent up by the recognized government is so defective, or shows such facts that we cannot receive it. For example, suppose it does not show that the Constitution has been complied with, or suppose it shows on its face that it was not complied with? The Constitution requires its face that it was not complied with? The Constitution requires electors to vote by ballot; suppose the return shows upon its face that they voted viva voce? Can we receive it? Under this amendment we should be bound to receive it. We might reject it for the same reason under which both Houses would be authorized to reject a return under the first section. Suppose, if you please now, that the return which comes up from the recognized government shows that the persons voted for for President and Vice-President both resided in the same State, in violation of another provision of the Constitution, are we bound to receive it? We should be under this amendment. Under the first section if there was but one return we should not be bound Therefore I suggest, even when the return comes from the recognized government, Congress should be left to reject it under the second section as we should have a right to do under the first if there is but one return. I trust I am comprehended by the Senator.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think I comprehend the honorable Senator.

Mr. MORTON. As the amendments stand, if there are two returns, then the case is taken out from under the operation of the first sec then the case is taken out from under the operation of the first section, and there being two returns, that return which is authenticated by the recognized government of the State must be accepted; it does not leave to Congress the discretion it would have under the first section where there was but one return.

Mr. MERRIMON. The object of my amendment is to cut off the very difficulties that the Senator has suggested. Surely Congress would be willing to receive the return, if it was right in all other respects, which has been sent forward by the State authorities in harmony with the United States. The object of this amendment, the legal effect of it, is to put the electoral return as sent forward by the authorities in harmony with the United States upon an exact footing with the returns from every other State. It is to put the returns sent forward by the government not so recognized out of the case entirely; and if it should turn out that there is any defect in the returns sent forward by the government so recognized by the United States, of course it would be upon a footing with the returns from all other States, as if it was suggested that there was a forgery or that there was any other defect; a concurrent vote under the first that there was any other defect; a concurrent vote under the first section would reject it.

Mr. MORTON. The precise point I call attention to is whether that would be the legal effect of the second section if amended as proposed. I ask the Secretary to read the second section as it would stand amended as my friend proposes, and then I ask him whether it does not in the case of two returns require Congress to accept anyhow that return which comes from the recognized authority f

Mr. MERRIMON. Not necessarily. The only effect I intended it to have is to put the return that is sent by the authority not in harmony with the United States out of the case altogether, and put the return sent forward by the lawful authority of the State and recogreturn sent forward by the lawful authority of the State and recognized by the United States on a footing with the returns sent from other States. I think that is legal and fair.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend listen to the reading as amended? I ask that the section be read as it will stand if amended by this amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that returns from such State shall be counted which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States, as provided by the Constitution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think that a legal construction of that amendment will give it this effect: that, if two returns are sent, that one which is sent by the authorities of the State not in harmony with the United States is put out of the count altogether and cast aside; and then it leaves the returns sent by the authorities recognized by the United States upon an exactly equal footing with the returns sent from every other State.

Mr. MORTON. Let me suggest an addition to my friend's amendment to obviate the objection, so that he may present the proposition fairly as I think:

And that return which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States, as provided by the Constitution: Provided, That such return shall be otherwise the true and valid return.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think I have objection to that. I will scrutinize that suggestion after I get through with my remarks. It appears to me now that I have no objection to the suggestion, because my purpose is simply to put the returns sent forward by the authorities of the State in harmony with the United States upon an exact footing with those of the other States, and to put the returns sent by the authority not in harmony with the United States out of the case Surely there can be no objection to that.

The United States are in harmony, as I have said in the outset in debating this part of the subject, always with the proper State authorities; and, when an emergency arises so that positive action must be taken, first the President, if called upon, recognizes the lawful State ne taken, first the Frestoent, it called upon, recognizes the lawful State authority; and, if Congress shall not act, when the authority thus recognized by the President sends forward the electoral vote, that must be counted. If Congress shall reverse his action by a joint resolution or otherwise, and declare that the other authority is the lawful one, the vote sent by it must be counted. This provision cuts off the debate and dispute that might arise on the occasion of the counting of the vote, in times of high excitement, about whether one government.

ing of the vote, in times of high excitement, about whether one government was the lawful government or another government was the lawful government. We need to keep that question just as far from the occasion of counting the votes as possible.

Let me illustrate this point by putting a supposed case. I will take the case of Rhode Island during the Dorr rebellion. Suppose that Dorr's rebellion had succeeded further than it did and that it had gone on to the extent of electing or appointing an electoral ticket for President and Vice-President and the charter authorities had done

Suppose the rival governments had gone to that extent, and the Dorr government had sent forward an electoral return to Congress, and the charter government had done likewise. In that case, under the amendment that I have offered, as the charter govease, under the amendment that I have observed, as the charter government was the government in harmony with the United States, the Dorr return would have been put out of the case entirely. It would have given rise to no debate or trouble. Why? Because the other government was the government in harmony with the United States. The President had recognized the governor under the charter government, and Congress might therefore have recognized the governor under the charter government by joint resolution. In that case, under this amendment, the Dorr return would have given rise to no trouble at all; it would have been cast out. There would have been no doubt about it; and the regular return under the charter governno doubt about it; and the regular return under the charter govern-ment would have been counted just like the return from any other State. That is exactly what I want to effectuate. I wish to cut off disputes and quarrels that might arise at the time of counting the vote by excited factions or excited parties that might attempt to do an act unlawful in itself to affect the result at that moment.

But, Mr. President, I will not avoid any difficulty about this ques-on. I want to meet it, and meet it as fairly as I am able to do. Suppose the case, as it is alleged, was the case of Louisiana lately, where an election has been held—and, under such circumstances as that, it is contended there is no government at all—where the State government is completely dismantled; still there are two factions there. There is the Kellogg faction; there is also the McEnery faction, each claiming to administer the true State government. The Kellogg faction sends forward an electoral return; the McEnery faction sends forward an electoral return; and there has been no positive recognition by the President or by Congress of either of them. Then it may be asked, and, I think, with pertinence, what is to be done in that case? My answer to that is this: In the first place, it is not probable, it is only remotely possible, that such a case could ever arise. In the next place, it is not probable that the two branches of Congress, in the discharge of their high duty, would divide, one House against the other, upon a question of that sort.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Suppose one House recognizes one and the other

House the other f Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. MERRIMON. In that case I think they would be bound to count the one recognized by the President, unless Congress should

Mr. JOHNSTON. Would a State government in harmony with the President, but not with Congress, be in harmony with the United States?

Mr. MERRIMON. Most assuredly not; the Congress is the supreme anthority in such a case. But that is to say the President is corrupt and has prostituted his office. We cannot proceed upon such a supposition. Laws are passed on the supposition that the authorities of the Government will do their duty as they understand it and faithfully. Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina where he gets the authority from the Constitution to require any certificate from the executive authority. I ask whether the electoral college itself may not certify its own vote?

Mr. MORTON. The act of 1792—
Mr. WHYTE. I ask in the Constitution. I know it is in the act of 1792; but where in the Constitution is there such a provision that the electoral college cannot certify its own vote?

Mr. MERRIMON. Plainly, by the necessary, the essential, the inevitable implication. Unless some provision of that sort were made by act of Congress, how could Congress ever come in connection and contact with the electoral college? It is necessary that Congress should take some action to provide some means, some evidence by which the Congress, the counting power, shall know that the State had done its office or the people of the State had done their office in electing electors who make the electoral college. There is where the authority comes from. It comes by necessary and inevitable implication; and therefore the act of 1795 provides that the executive of the State shall give the elector a certificate of his election, and he shall send it with the certificate of the return. It is in that way the power is manifest and proceeds from the Constitution, or, rather, is inherent in it. And in answer to my friend from Virginia, if the President shall recognize an insurgent government, if he is corrupt enough to do it when he knows it ought not to be done, I see no other remedy than that the Congress must be bound by it, unless Congress will reverse his action; and to say to me that he is corrupt, deciding with his party for his party's sake, is to say to me that there must be the end of government, is to say to me the Senate will not act with the House and count the votes, and Congress will not perform that act, or will not do any other act that the Constitution charges We cannot proceed and act upon the supposition that the President is corrupt or that Congress is corrupt in any particular manner. The Constitution supplies the remedy; and if the President should recognize the State government in the case supposed, and evidence should be offered tending to show that he did it corruptly and prostituted his power, he could be impeached for it; but that is not a supposable case in debating a question like this.

I lo not think that in the case of Louisiana the State government was dismantled for reasons which I have given repeatedly on former occasions. But suppose a case—and it is a barely possible case—where a State government is completely dismantled; in the first place, I say, it is barely possible that such a case could ever happen. In the next place, I say that, if it could, it is scarcely possible that when such a return would come to Congress the two Houses of Congress would not concur in rejecting it, and when they did concur in rejecting it the American people would sanction it. If the people of a State should behave so badly, if they should conduct the State government in such a way as to dismantle it and prostitute it by general disturbance, so as not to be able to tell whether they have any government at all the American people and the people in that very State would say that Congress ought to exclude such a vote from the count. Suppose that in that case the political parties in Congress should be so debased by party zeal as that they would not agree upon what was right in such a case, they would jeopardize the country, and the result would be they would sit and contest and wrangle about it until the 4th March would come; and, as the law now exists, when that time came, the controversy would be over. The President of the Senate pro tempore under the act of 1792 would be President and would remain President until, under the Constitution, a new election for President and Vice-President could take place.

That would be the effect. That is the way the matter would run. and it would give rise to no disorder. I say it is scarcely worth while to contemplate such extreme cases; they are barely possible. I trust in God the case never may arise. It is barely possible that such a contingency could happen.

Before I take my seat, Mr. President, and I beg pardon of the Senate for detaining them so long—my only apology is that this is a very interesting subject, and I want to get and give all the light I can—I wish to consider how the two Houses sit together in counting the electoral vote. At the last session, in a hurried running debate here, I expressed the opinion with some hesitation that they sat together in joint session and acted as one body en masse, and that they did so in deciding all questions that came before them. I think that a fair argument can be made in support of that view. I know that one or two gentlemen entertained the view I then entertained, gentlemen for whom I have the highest respect, and they entertain that opinion still. I should be gratified to hear what they have to say on that subject. The strong inclination of my mind, however, is the other way after very considerable reflection, and I will submit one or two reasons that have brought me to that conclusion. The Constitution

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It will be noted that the Constitution does not provide that it shall be done in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives sitting in joint session, and I do not think by any implication we can supply those words. It is not necessary to do it. The Constitution can operate leaving these words to have their natural meaning and can operate leaving these words to have their natural meaning and force, and by implication or inference we cannot interpolate the words "sitting in joint session." If the Constitution read: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, sitting in joint session, open all the certificates," &c., then I would say without hesitation that they must sit as one body and en masse for the purpose of determining all questions that might arise in counting the vote. But it does not say that; it says the Senate and House of Representatives. The "Senate" has a technical meaning. It does not imply the seventy-four men who compose the Senate as Senators in their individual capacity. It implies the seventy-four men, or a quorum of them, sitting in this Hall, organized, with a presiding officer, and proceeding to business under organized, with a presiding officer, and proceeding to business under the Constitution and laws. That is what is meant by "Senate." It has a technical meaning. It means the Senators composing the Senate, organized in the Sonate or in the proper place to proceed and act, to do anything within their jurisdiction under the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. I want to call the attention of my friend now to what I think is the defect in his amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not through on this point. I will ask the Senator to do so presently. The same remarks are applicable with the change of circumstances to the House of Representatives. The Constitution in this respect treats them as separate and distinct bodies, and it seems to me that they must vote and act as separate and distinct bodies; and, by the necessity of the case, when a question shall arise the two branches of Congress, proceeding as I have undertaken to indicate in my remarks they ought to proceed, the House of Representatives must decide the question for itself there in its own If practicable, the Senate might decide the same question for itself there; but, as it would not be practicable to do that, it must retire to its Chamber or some other convenient place and decide it there. When each has made a decision upon any particular question arising, then the two bodies may come together and announce the decision. Suppose they do not agree; then the disagreement has the same effect as the disagreement of the two Houses upon any measure of legislation or any other matter that they are called to act upon in their legislative capacity.

I will thank the Senator from Indiana now to make the explanation that he desired to make a moment ago.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from North Carolina, in his proposed amendment, strikes out that part of the second section which requires the joint action of the two Houses:

And that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

And he makes it read:

And that return from such State shall be counted which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States as provided by the Constitution.

I do not know whether he intends to leave out the concurrence of the two Houses, but he leaves the same question to be decided by his amendment. He requires that return to be counted which "shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States." There is the question still to be demony with the United States." There is the question still to be decided which of these two pretended governments is recognized by and which one is in harmony with the United States. There being two returns and two pretended governments, somebody must decide that question. We say the President of the Senate cannot decide it; the House cannot decide it alone; the Senate cannot decide it alone. Therefore that government must be selected by both Houses; and the arrendment of the Senate will leave the minimum of the Senate will the amendment of the Senator still leaves the main question open to be decided, which is the government acting in harmony with the United States; in other words, which is the lawful government of the State. I submit to my friend that that question can only be determined by both Houses, and where the two Houses disagree about that the question is left open just as it was before.

Mr. MERRIMON. My answer to that is this, and I thought I made myself understood awhile ago, that there is at all times an authority of the State government in harmony with the Government of the light of the state government in harmony with the Government of the light of the state government in harmony with the Government of the light of the state government in harmony with the Government of the light of the state government in harmony with the government of the light of the state government in harmony with the government of the light of the state government in harmony with the government of the light of the state government in harmony with the government of the light of There cannot be a time when the Government of the United States does not recognize one authority or another. Sometimes it becomes necessary to recognize it actively, as where there is a call upon the President to exercise power in suppressing an insur-rection against the State, or where it becomes necessary for Congress to guarantee to the State a republican form of government. In that case, where the President has recognized the authority, if Congress has not taken action, that electoral ticket would ordinarily be counted. To say that it would not be counted; to say that the Congress sitting here to count the electoral vote would not count it, and count it without debate, that they would go out of the way to raise a question, is to say, it seems to me, that they would be corrupt, that they would not be willing to submit in good faith to a provision of the law. Then I go further and say, that if it was contemplated that such contingencies could arise about a particular State, it would be competent for Congress in advance of the meeting of the two branches of Congress to count the electoral vote, to declare by concurrent resolution, over any action of the President, which was the lawful State government. But suppose that the wrangle, the conflict, that the Senator suggests, should arise, (which I endeavored to show was a bare possibility,) and the two parties, or the three parties, or the contending parties should consent to be prostituted by party zeal, so that they could not make a decision, the controversy would simply go on till the 4th of March, when it would end by limitation of time, and the President pro tempore of the Senate would be the President of the United States temporarily, and a new election would take place under the Constitution and laws.

Mr. MORTON. I fear I did not make myself understood by the Senator from North Carolina. It comes right back to this point: here are two returns opened by the Vice-President from two pretended governments in a State. His amendment says that that return shall be counted which comes from the lawful government of the State, but the very question to be decided is, which is the lawful government of the State?

Mr. MERRIMON. I go on the ground that it has been decided before that time.

Mr. MORTON. I submit that is to be decided by both Houses, and my friend in his amendment strikes out that part which requires the my friend in his amendment strikes out that part which requires the concurrence of both Houses.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I contend that the decision touching that matter has been made before actively by the President, where necessary for him to take action, or actively by Congress; and if there is a conflict of the parties whereby they cannot agree, the conflict goes on. I admit that you could possibly raise such a question; and if such a contingency should arise, then I think it would go on until, by lapse of time and by operation of law, the presiding officer of the Senten would become President, and a new election would have to take ate would become President, and a new election would have to take place.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator says the decision would be made before as to which was the lawful government of the State; but who is to decide how that decision was made? Who is to decide that question? Suppose that question arises. I say the President has decided it, and we are bound by his decision. Another says no, the President never decided that question; he did a certain act, but that was not a recognition of the State government. I will call my friend's attention to an illustration of this very difficulty on this floor. I have averaged in the case that a verse from I opinion that the President up. argued in the case that arose from Louisiana that the President, under the act of 1795, had the power, and that he was authorized thereunto by Congress, to decide which was the lawful government of the unto by Congress, to decide which was the lawful government of the State, and that that decision was binding upon the whole Government until the United States, through Congress, by the action of both Houses, determined otherwise. I thought that was the law then; I think so now; but that view was disputed, I believe, by nearly everybody on this side of the Chamber, and some on the other side of the Chamber. Then it was argued that, although the President had a few recognized one covernment in Louisians at taken the recognized one covernment in Louisians at the lawful that the the lawful so far recognized one government in Louisiana as to keep the peace under it, he had not done an act which recognized it as the lawful government. So, after all, the question comes right back. Here are two sets of returns. It is said the President has recognized the government that sent one of them; but who is to settle the question whether the President did recognize that government? That very question must be settled by somebody, and I submit it must be settled by both Houses. Therefore I think my friend's amendment is defective

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand the Senator suggests as a mode of avoiding the difficulty that the two Houses may settle in advance the question suggested by the Senator from Indiana, but he provides no means of informing the two Houses officially that two returns exist. The returns are required to be sent to the Vice-President and remain in his custody. He opens them for the first time after the two Houses assemble in joint convention. That is the first official information that occurs that there are two returns, and it is too late then to provide for the difficulty suggested.

Mr. MERRIMON. We well know if such a state of things exists in a State as that two electoral returns would be sent forward.

Mr. JOHNSTON. How do we know it?

Mr. MERRIMON. We do not know it officially, but still a member of Congress having personal knowledge of the facts would bring the matter before Congress officially; he could suggest it, and Congress could appoint a committee to institute an inquiry into the condition of the State and take proper action by joint resolution or otherwise.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose in that case, if my friend permits me, Congress undertakes to settle in advance and cannot agree about it, then comes the same question.

Mr. MERRIMON. I endeavored to explain that a moment ago. That case is barely a possible one, and not at all probable. In that case the controversy would go on until the 4th of March, as the law now stands, and the count of the vote for President and Vice-President would be defeated, and another election would have to take place under the Constitution and laws.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senator this question: The Constitu-tion provides that the certificate of returns shall not be opened until the two Houses meet in joint convention. How can the question as to which are the true returns be said to be up until the returns are opened? The Constitution provides that they shall not be opened until the two Houses meet in joint assembly. How is it possible to settle the question in advance 1

Mr. MERRIMON. I thought I had answered that, but I will do it again.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not think the Senator can answer it very well.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think I can. My friend does not make it so by simply saying so. I cannot make anything so by simply saying it is so; I must have some reason to underlie my assertions. There must be reason, there must be substance underlying my declaration, or it is worth nothing. I say in the first place, as I said a moment ago, if such a controversy should arise in a State, it could not be done without the notice of the nation, and it would be perfectly competent before the time to count the votes arrives for a member of Congress to bring it before the House or the Senate and raise a proper inquiry in that behalf. That would be a contingency in which it would be proper for Congress to pass a concurrent resolution declaring that one government or the other was the lawful government and the one to be recognized by the United States, and when they had passed such a joint resolution, under the decision of the Supreme Court which I a joint resolution, ander the decision of the supreme Court, which I have read from, it would be the duty of Congress, the duty of the Supreme Court, the duty of the President and all other officials of the Union to recognize that as the true and lawful government.

But then my friend's question goes further than that. He says, how could you tell until the returns were opened which was the lawful Suppose, the moment the return is opened and it is handed to the tellers appointed under the direction of the two branches of Congress, it appears that one return is signed by John Smith. The Congress knows at once that John Smith is the governor of the State recognized by the joint resolution of Congress or the governor of the State recognized by the President, Congress having taken no action, and the count would be made forthwith. That is the way it would be done. Then if there was another return signed by John Jones, who represented the insurgent government of the State, the moment it was opened the Senate and House of Representatives would see that he was the insurgent governor. In that case the return would be rejected. It would not be counted at all, nor would it be debatable. That is the effect of my amendment; and it does seem be debatable. That is the effect of my amendment; and it does seem to me that under it the whole working machinery would operate thoroughly and well. The one main object I had in view in offering the amendment was to cut off a wrangle that might arise in the count of the vote about which was the lawful governor. I do not think it is very material for the reason I assigned a while ago, to wit, that it is harely possible that such a case could ever exist, and, if it should happen, then it is barely possible that Congress could ever become so prostituted by party zeal as that it would jeopardize the interests of the country by refusing to take proper action in that respect.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have withheld the amendments that were under discussion yesterday, partly because I did not intend to speak to them and partly because I felt that some amendments might be offered that would do away with the necessity for those which I had already presented. I have already said in substance all I intended to say as to what seemed to me the value of the amendments that I have placed before this body. There has been laid upon the desks of the members of the Senate this morning an amendment which I shall now offer, and I beg to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the amendment that is now to be offered is not that which was upon their desks a day or two ago, coming from me. It has been changed somewhat, in order to meet the objections urged by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] and the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] among others. I have offered it in the spirit of compromise. It seems to me to cover some of the objections that have been offered by the Senators from Virginia and Texas, and I believe by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper.] I now offer as an amendment to the pending bill the additional sections which I send to the Chair, and I ask the Clerk to read them.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as additional sections to the bill the following:

to the bill the following:

SEC. —. To insure each State the count of the electoral vote, except it shall be rejected, as provided for in section 1 of this act, it is declared the duty of each House of Congress to record its vote by yeas and nays upon all questions as to which are the true and valid returns of a State; and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House to immediately forward to the other a true and detailed return of such vote.

SEC. —. Should it then appear that the two Houses have failed to agree as to which are the true and valid returns, they shall immediately re-assemble, and the President of the Senate shall amnounce those returns as valid which shall have received a majority of all the votes cast in both Houses of Congress, considered as if in joint meeting assembled.

SEC. —. Should it occur that the aggregate vote of both Houses be equally divided upon the question, then, and in that event only, the President of the Senate shall give the casting vote.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Indiana, in speaking yesterday to this question, said that no plan had been presented, that no plan could be presented, which would not in certain exigencies leave a State unrepresented. I called his attention yesterday to the fact that the operation of the amendment that I had proposed would get rid of that difficulty. Under the amendment that I have suggested there is no contingency in which the electoral vote of a State can fail to be counted. Whether this be the right plan or not, I do not pre-tend to say; but I do say that the two Houses of Congress in one way or another will decide, and must decide, which the true returns of a State are, and the difficulty that has been so frequently suggested in the course of this debate is overcome by it, and that, too, in a plain, practical manner.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The chief objection I have to the pending amendment is that it seems to me to proceed on the erroneous idea that it is competent under the Constitution for the two Houses to meet and act in joint convention. It appears to me from the reading of the Constitution that they act in their separate capacities, and that it is incompetent to provide by an act of Congress for their ac-tion in joint convention at all. This amendment evidently proceeds on the idea that it is competent. It provides that:

The President of the Senate shall announce those returns as valid which shall have received a majority of all the votes cast in both Houses of Congress, considered as if in joint meeting assembled.

If that does not make a joint convention I am incapable of under-standing the language. Then, again, the last section of the amendment reads:

Should it occur that the aggreate vote of both Houses be equally divided upon the question, then, and in that event only, the President of the Senate shall give the casting vote.

That does not touch the point, however. The main thing, and it seems to me the sufficient one, is that it attempts to make a joint convention where the Constitution requires the two Houses to act in their separate capacities.

Mr. MORTON. I did not hear my friend from Michigan very distinctly, but I think he stated the objection to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. It proposes to have the effect of a joint convention without having it in fact. The two Houses shall vote separately, but, if they disagree, then we shall count the number of votes in the House and the number of votes in the Senate, the number on the one side and the number on the other side, and whichever aggregates the largest in favor of the return, that shall be counted. For example, there are two hundred and ninety-two votes in the House: one-half is one hundred and forty-six; seventy-four votes in the Senate: one-half is thirty-seven. The two Houses not agreeing, if there should be thirty-eightvotes in the Senate in favor of one set of returns and one hundred and forty-six votes in the House in favor of the same set, then add those two sums together and that makes the majority, and decides it. I state it correctly?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I think that would be a very great anomaly under our Constitution, and it would hardly work.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I endeavored to show, in presenting the original amendment, that so far from this being an anomalous condition of affairs, as the Senator from Indiana has stated, in certain contingencies the States would practically decide the result through the vote of the Senate; that in other contingencies the House of Representatives, and thus the people, would decide; and that in still other contingencies, when the aggregate vote of the two Houses left the matter evenly divided, then, and in that event only, the President of the Senate with his casting vote would decide, as was contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Texas. So then, it seems to me, if I may use the word, that the chances are equal in favor of one or the other of these plans; that no special advantage is given under the proposition I have made either to the Senate, to the House, or to the presiding officer of the two bodies. I am aware that the plan is open to the objection made by the Senator from Michigan; but if he will consider he will see that it is not a joint meeting, but that it is a law in effect fixing upon the President of the Senate a rule by which he shall in certain emergencies consider calmly the vote. That is all there is of it. It may have the effect of a joint meeting; I grant that it has; but it gets rid of the objection which has been urged, that there is no right in the two Houses to come together in a joint meeting.

I have no further remarks to offer. The Senate has already been I suspect that the amendment detained a long time on this question. which I have offered will meet the fate that all the other amendments have met with. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, navs 37; as follows:

15, hays 31; as 10110Ws:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Caperton, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Johnston, McCreery, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, and Withers—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christianey, Conkling, Crazin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorseev, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Howe, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, English, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, and Wallace—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggested the first day this bill was under consideration a difficulty that occurred to me under the first section. I have since called the attention of the chairman of the committee to the same difficulty, which is in no manner connected with the question we have been discussing; but it seems to me that the concluding language of the first section is such that it may lead to trouble, and indeed to very great trouble. I see no necessity at all for the concluding sentence of the first section. The possible difficultry arises in this way: It will be seen by consulting the prior part of the section that it is provided that unless the two Houses agree in rejecting a vote where there is but one return, that vote shall be counted. Then the concluding sentence is:

It seems to me that if a question is submitted and the two Houses do not concur in rejecting it or in the negative, then, under that language, it would be determined in the affirmative. I think it is susceptible of that construction, and therefore I suggest and I move to strike out the concluding sentence. I do not think it is necessary at all, for the reason that the two Houses would necessarily have the power and the right to take up any subject pertinent to the matter under consideration; and such question ought to be determined by the ordinary rules that obtain in deliberative bodies; whereas if this language is retained, it seems to me we may be led into the very difficulty that I suggest. Certain it is from this language, "determined in like manner," if the "like manner" refers to the provision touching the rejection of a vote where there is but one return and the two Houses cannot agree in such rejection, then it is to be counted; so if any question pertinent to the manner of counting the votes is sented and the two Houses do not agree against the motion made, it seems to me it logically follows that it would be adopted.

Let me put an illustration. Suppose that during the time of counting the votes some person shall move that a committee be appointed, that the subject under consideration be referred to a committee of three or five. The two Houses separate and vote upon that question. That is a question legitimate and pertinent to the matter under con-The House of Representatives determines to vote for the committee, the Senate against it. It seems to me from this language it would follow that the committee would be raised.

Mr. MORTON. I would say to my friend from Iowa that if he makes a motion to strike out that sentence, as far as I am concerned, I shall not resist it. Perhaps there would be some obscurity in it, and I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to strike out the last sentence of the first ection, in the following words:

And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are as-sembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

Mr. THURMAN. The same question was before the Senate at the last session when the bill was up stricken out I believe unanimously, stricken out I believe unanimously.

The question is on the amendment

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest also an amendment in the last section of the bill to remove an obscurity. It is a matter of doubt, as the language stands, whether, if one House shall determine to take a recess, that operates to work a recess as to both Houses, or it is intended that a recess may be taken by one House and the other continue in the discharge of its duty. I understand the intention is that one House may take a recess without working a recess of the other. I therefore suggest that in line 16 of section 4, between the words "recess" and "not," the words "of such House" be inserted.

Mr. MORTON. That is what it was intended to mean. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no doubt that was the intention, but I think the language as it is leaves it a matter of doubt, and therefore I move the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. In order to make the bill consistent with the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to the first section, I move to strike out of the third section, in lines 3 and 4, the words "or for the decision of any other question pertinent thereto." That is necessary after having stricken out the last sentence of the

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend that I doubt whether it logically follows that you should strike those words out because we have omitted what was in the first section. This is giving a rule, as I understand, to govern the two Houses when they shall separate as I understand, to govern the two houses when they shall separate with reference to the discussion; and if you omit these words entirely it might be construed to follow that you cannot consider any other question except the single ultimate one. My object in striking out the language in the first section was that it was susceptible of a misconstruction as to the rule that would obtain in deciding such questions.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the words ought to go out. They were stricken out of the previous bill, and I think they ought to go out of this, for the very reason which the Senator has suggested, that they may be liable to a very wrong interpretation and are very objectionable to some Senators for fear of their being misconstrued. There can be no trouble about the Senate exercising any of the powers that are necessary for the convenience of its proceedings, and these words are not necessary in order to enable it to exercise those powers which are necessary to the proper order and convenience of its proceedings. I hope therefore there will be no objection to striking those words out. I want this bill to command as universal assent as it is possible to obtain for it, and these words are very obnoxious to some.

of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to one or two other amendments which were made at the committee to one or two other amendments which were made at the last session, which I think ought to be made in this bill. Line 8 of section 1 provides: "One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives." I do not see any reason for distinguishing between the dignity or the weight of the two Houses. I move to strike out "one teller" and insert "two tellers," so that there may be the same number of tellers at the vert of each brench of the same number of tellers. on the part of each branch.

Mr. MORTON. I see no objection to that. I will only say that I believe that from the first count, which was made in 1789, it has been the custom to appoint one teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House; but I see no reason for that. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I now move to insert after the word "votes," at the end of line 11 of section 1, these words:

Which certificates shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter "A."

The reason for that is that the mode of calling the States upon any question whatsoever is different in the Senate from what it is in the House. In the Senate we always observe the alphabetical order; in the House, on the contrary, they call the States in the order in which they were admitted into the Union for petitions and the like—I do not refer to calling the yeas and nays, for of course then the members are called by their names.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. This adopts the simple plain rule of alphabetical order. The chairman of the committee says he has no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to strike out in the third line of section 1 the words "the two Houses of Congress," and insert "the Senate and House of Representatives," so as to conform to the language of the Constitution. That was agreed to in the previous bill. It will then

That the Senate and House of Representatives shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at one o'clock, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MERRIMON. At the end of line 4 of section 1, after the words
"one o'clock," I move to insert the letters "p. m."
Mr. MORTON. All right.
The amendment was agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I do not desire at this late hour, after the prolonged discussion we have had, to detain the Senate long. I have voted steadily against every amendment that has been sought to be placed upon this bill, and I shall vote against the bill, and I desire to state very briefly the views which govern my action.

desire to state very briefly the views which govern my action.

In the first place, I am opposed to legislative tinkering of the Constitution; and the first question that each Senator should put to himself is, Is there any necessity for a bill of this character? And the second question is, Has Congress any power to legislate upon this subject whatever? A great deal has been said here with regard to the operation of parties in discussing amendments, and my good friend, the senior Senator from the State of Rhode Island, [Mr.Anthony,] gave the key to it. When a proposition was made that the House of Representatives as States should not proposition was made that the House of Representatives as States should not proposite the scale of since the second state of since the second state and state stat resentatives as States should vote upon this subject, my good friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, suggested, why not put in the words "the next democratic national convention?" This question ought not to be approached in any way in a party spirit. I will not be accused of discussing this question from that stand-point, because I accused of discussing this question from that stand-point, because I undertake to say now that the Constitution is perfect to-day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from Connecticut give way? I believe the Senator from Connecticut is not very well to-day and does not care about finishing his speech now. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield for that purpose ?

Mr. EATON. Yes, sir.
Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the stage of the pending bill?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the bill been read the third time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know that. I ask, if we are going into executive session, that the bill as it now stands be printed, so that we may all see it to-morrow as it is.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall finish the bill to-day. We are very near the determination of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive busines

Mr. MORTON. I hope that motion will be withdrawn. Let us finish this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope not. The Senator from Connecticut would Mr. BAYARD. I hope not. And prefer to go on to-morrow morning.

PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Mr. HAMLIN. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Pennsylvania to accommodate the Senator from Connecticut. Instead of going into executive session, I ask that I be allowed to call up the bill establishing certain post-roads. It is highly desirable, because in some of the States for which routes are provided the lettings are about to be advertised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania insist on his motion?

Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania. Not at present. Mr. HAMLIN. Then, with the consent of the Senator from Connection

Mr. MORTON. Let not the electoral bill be displaced, but left as the unfinished business.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going to make this suggestion with the consent of the Senator from Connecticut: I ask that this bill be informally passed by, to retain its place, and allow the post-route bill to be taken up

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none; and the post-route bill is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I move that the bill about the electoral votes be printed with the amendments as they stand.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMLIN. I learn that the bill with the amendments has been sent to the printer, which was unnecessary, as it was once printed, but there were three or four additional amendments reported when the bill was reported the second time which are not here, and I presume we cannot proceed with the bill now. I therefore shall have to postpone it until to-morrow morning. I will ask the Senate to take it up to-morrow in the morning hour, because the Department, as I have stated, is now waiting to advertise routes in certain States embraced in the bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened; and (at three o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 23, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved,

PAYMENT OF MISSOURI TROOPS IN UNION ARMY.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2814) to authorize the Third Auditor of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri to State troops serving in the Union Army; and also the evidence as to supplies furnished to troops, and which are yet unpaid; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE NEAR PORT AUSTIN, MICHIGAN.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Light-House Board be requested to inform this House, first, what, if any, preparation has been made for building a light-house near Port Austin, Michigan, since the appropriation therefor was made; second, whether the interest of the navigation of the lakes would not be materially promoted by placing the proposed light-house out on the reef rather than on the shore; and, third, what, if any, additional appropriation would be required to place a sufficient light-house on the reef.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SEELYE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday refused concurrence in the Senate amendments to the Red Cloud appropriation bill, the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in appropriations for certain

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire action on the motion one of does he merely wish to enter it?

Mr. SEELYE. I would like action on the motion now. I can state the question very briefly; and I think that upon such statement the motion will command the assent of the House.

The reasons for the increase proposed by the Senate in this appropriation are that the actual appropriation for the Red Cloud agency last year was below the estimate of the expenses for that agency, while the actual expenses for the agency during the year have largely exceeded the estimate. The reasons for this excess are two: First, a very large incursion of Indians there in connection with the Black Hills negotiation during the last summer; and, second, the coming in during the present winter of a thousand wild Indians, who have not before reported at the agency. The consequence of this reduced appropriation and this increased expenditure has been the entire exhaustion of supplies for the Red Cloud agency at the end of last month. The exigency has been met by borrowing from supplies intended for the Spotted Tail agency, the only agency near at hand from which supplies could be procured. But this source of supply is very nearly exhausted; and within a very few days, unless this appropriation be made, the Indians of both these agencies will have no supplies. The estimate of $150,000 is the lowest estimate on which the Indian Bureau and the Department of the Interior consider the supplies can be furnished up to the 30th of June next. The House passed the bill appropriating $100,000. The Senate added an amendment of $50,000, in which the House yesterday declined to concur. I move a reconsideration of that vote in order to move concurrence of the House in the Senate amendment.

I might state, Mr. Speaker, that the actual appropriation for these agencies last year was $425,000 less than the estimate, while the actual expenses have been very much more than the estimates.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, as I reported the bill, perhaps it would be proper for me to make one or two remarks. I certainly have no feeling myself in regard to this matter, either as a member of the House or as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. That committee investigated this matter as well as it could. It had all the facts before it. It had the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; it had also the report of the Black Hills commission; and, sir, after a full investigation the committee were of the opinion that to feed after a full investigation the committee were of the opinion that to feed these wild Indians, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks, only required from $23,000 to $25,000. I do not desire to make any attack whatever on the efficiency of the Indian Commissioner; not at all; but I must say in his appearance before the Committee on Appropriations he was able to give us but little information. After the committee investigated the matter they came to the conclusion that $100,000 was an exceedingly liberal appropriation. Indeed, sir the $100,000 was an exceedingly liberal appropriation. Indeed, sir, the committee thought for some time $50,000 was enough. Finally, however, it was agreed, on motion—if I may speak not improperly of such a subject—of a republican member of the committee, to make the appropriation $100,000.

Now, I believe that is entirely sufficient, so far as these Indians are concerned. As to any information which makes it necessary to increase the appropriation to $150,000, in our judgment it is not before the committee. We are told that wild Indians have come in there lately. I suppose some have come in. The appropriation as asked for to feed those Indians amounted to only $23,000 or $25,000. It is true there is a deficiency, and there is always a deficiency, it seems to me, in reference to the management of Indian affairs. I think, if we agree to the bill as passed by the House and standing by the action of the committee in this matter, $100,000 will be found to be nple. I yield now to the gentleman from Wyoming, [Mr. STEELE.] The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Wyoming proceeds, the Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he is informed by the Clerk this bill has already gone to the Senate. He therefore respectfully suggests the motion to reconsider be left pending for the present and the gentleman from Massachusetts shall move to request the Senate to return the bill.

Mr. SEELYE. I am very happy to make that motion. I think it can be assented to by the House with the simple statement that there are now 19,000 Indians at least at these two agencies. are now 19,000 Indians at least at these two agencies. There is not a particle of food for them left at the Red Cloud agency belonging to the appropriation, and it has been borrowing from the Spotted Tail agency. It is a simple sum to find how much is necessary to feed these 19,000 Indians up to the 30th of June next. The Interior Department and the Indian Bureau have assured me that $150,000 is the lowest estimate they can make.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say one word in reference to this subject, and will ask the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Committee on Appropriations, before reporting this deficiency bill, authorized the President of the United States to send an officer of the Army to this agency for the purpose of making an examination into the nature of the deficiency and the amount which would be required to meet the demands of the Indians. I understand that report has not been received as yet by the committee. The officer designated to make that examination was Major Merritt, of the Ninth Cavalry. I see in the newspapers which I receive from my Territory it is stated, with how much truth of course I do not know, that Major Merritt was interviewed on his return from making that examination, and is reported as saying that an appropriation of $50,000 would be amply sufficient to meet the demands of the Indians for their necessities.

I will also say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I was at the War Department yesterday, and the report of Major Merritt was then there. Of course I made no examination of it, and perhaps it would be well for the House to have that report, in order that it might act with knowledge of the facts of the case before making any defi-nite appropriation. I do not know whether Major Merritt has reported $50,000 as sufficient for the purpose, but the papers of my Territory have stated that he had come to that conclusion, and I suggest, as that report will be before the House in a day or two, that it would be wise to learn whether Major Merritt considers that there is a necessity for $150,000 or only $50,000, as it is a matter of considerable interest and difference.

Mr. SEELYE. I do not see any basis there for the action of the

May I be permitted to read two sentences from the message of the President of the United States transmitting this whole matter to the

I have taken proper steps to comply with this request of the House, but the present need of supplies is not disputed. A prolonged delay in furnishing provisions to these Indians will cause great distress and be likely to provoke raids on white settlements, and possibly lead to a general outbreak of hostilities.

This, sir, is the present need of the agency that urgently requires action on the part of Congress.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman favor the House with his views on the obligation of the people of the United States to feed all wild Indians that happen to come into these agencies?

Mr. SEELYE. Well, sir, if the gentleman will tell me how much cheaper it is to feed these Indians than to fight them, he would not need to address to me that question.

Mr. FORT. I want to know what more abligations.

I want to know what more obligation we are under to Mr. FORT.

feed wild Indians than any others.

Mr. SEELYE. I acknowledge the interest and importance of the inquiry of the gentleman, and should be very happy in answer to it to give any information in my power at the proper time. But here is the simple fact before us, that these Indians have to face the alternative of starving or stealing. Now, the question is whether we shall oblige them to steal or keep them from starving. Which is the cheaper? It is not any question of general expediency, but what is the most economical procedure at the present time?

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it is not the policy of the Government to get all the Indians upon reservations?

Mr. SEELYE. The Indians have been summoned there on the direct invitation of the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state how many wild Indians are there?

Mr. SEELYE. There are now, according to the best estimate, nineteen thousand Indians at these two agencies. There are one thousand vild Indians, who have never reported themselves, who have appeared at the agency during the present winter. And they have appeared there because the Government sent out word that unless they did report themselves they would be forced to it. And the Government sent that word in order to prevent raids on the whites.

Mr. PAGE. And promised to feed them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts another question. Does he propose to justify an appropriation of $150,000 on the ground that one thousand wild Indians have come in

Mr. SEELYE. As I have already stated to the House before the gentleman from Georgia came in, the actual appropriations for this agency were $425,000 less last year than the estimated expenses; and the actual expenses of the agencies have been very much more than the estimate, caused more by the large incursions of the Indians in connection with the Black Hills negotiations than by the fact of one thousand wild Indians reporting themselves at the agency.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for this appropriation is not very clear. The council that was held in connection with the is not very clear. Indians to obtain a cession of the Black Hills region of country was in the first instance supposed to be the occasion for an increased appropriation, not so much a deficiency as because of the fact that a large body of Indians were gathered together at the Red Cloud agency large body of Indians were gathered together at the Red Cloud agency for the purpose of having that negotiation. It is now very well understood that the deficiency does not result to any considerable extent from that cause. The number of Indians that were gathered together, provided for by appropriations in the last Congress, was comparatively small, so small as to require a very slight appropriation. But large numbers of Indians were gathered together at that council from the other seven Siony agencies: there are girlly of them altogether. the other seven Sioux agencies; there are eight of them altogether. It was assumed—and the force of that assumption has not yet been destroyed-that the supplies furnished for these other Indians were of course unexpended while the Indians were withdrawn from those other agencies to the place where this council was held; so that, in the case referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Spotted Tail agency, there were supplies of course unused in consequence of Tail agency, there were supplies of course unused in consequence of sending a body of those Indians to another point. It is taken for granted that appropriations, covering a period of some two months at least for the other agencies, are still on hand, and that supplies for the expense of driving cattle and the like of that can be very well brought to Red Cloud agency for the purpose of meeting this deficiency. The estimate of the whole amount required was $150,000. The House proposed to appropriate $100,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to ask my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Indiana, if it is not true that, so far as the Indians of the Spotted Tail agency are concerned, most of the supplies they used were brought with them? Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that to be the fact; not all the supplies that were furnished to them, but most of the supplies that the Indians of that agency received while at the Red Cloud agency, cattle being driven on the hoof. Still some supplies were furnished to them; just as to these other wild Indians and the Indians of the other six Sioux agencies. It was the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations of the House that there would be no embarrassment in getting through the present fiscal year by the appropriation of $100,000. The Senate has thought proper to increase that to $150,000. The attention of the House has already been called to the uncertainty of the testimony which the Committee on Appropriations have received on this subject, in part growing out of the fact that the gentleman who is now Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. John Q. Smith, whom I believe to be a very competent and honest man, has held the office but a very short time, and is but partially informed upon the subject. His predecessor of course, being out of office, is not available for information. The officer of the Army designated by the President, at the instance of the House, to furnish definite information has not yet made his report, but we shall probably have that report in a few days. It is believed that the report will be here in a very short time. That officer has already made the examination and is perhaps in this city, at least I infer so, for I noticed that he was in the city of Chicago a few days ago; but I have no definite information on the subject.

The question between $100,000 and $150,000 is a matter which might as well undergo the examination of a committee of conference. the Senate shall deem an increased appropriation necessary and proper, it will produce no material delay; so that I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Seelye] that it would be far better to let the bill take the usual course.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me to suggest that the officer whom the President sent out has returned and made his report, and I think it would be well for the House and the Senate to have that report before them before they act finally on this question. I trust therefore that the gen-tleman from Massachusetts will allow the bill to take the usual course, and have a conference committee asked by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. If, as my colleague has suggested, the officer of the Army detailed for the purpose of this investigation is in the city, there will be no great delay. A delay of a day or two certainly can do no harm. A conference on this subject would be well enough. I would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is very seldom that an appropriation of anything like this amount of $100,000 or $150,000 has been made on such shadowy information.

The gentleman knows, of course, that this council in the Black Hills

The gentleman knows, of course, that this council in the Black Hills was unauthorized by law; not simply unauthorized by law, but in defiance of law, and when considerable sums of money are asked from Congress to pay the expenses of this council, held in violation of positive statute law, there ought to be some consideration.

Another fact: If my friend will examine the details of the expenditures for the use of the agencies, he will find that a portion of the money was expended in connection with this council held in express violation of law; so that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Seelye] will see that this subject is quite an important one. It is not a mere question whether we shall appropriate $100,000 or $150,000 to feed starving Indians, but it is a question as to how far Congress shall go wantonly to work to ratify acts and expenditures of public money in direct violation of law. If we cannot restrain the Departments of the Government from spending money by positive limitation and prethen from diverting funds from one purpose to another, why then indeed the public Treasury is surrounded by very few and slight safeguards. All these subjects may well be considered, and it will involve a delay of a day or two only, which will do no harm.

Mr. PAGE. I do not care to discuss the subject really on its merits. I presume that the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Committee on Indian Affairs are in the possession of the fact that it is important that if any appropriation is made it shall be done immediately. The Committee on Appropriations very promptly reported to the House a bill appropriating $100,000, and the House very promptly passed it. The Senate, as I understand, has amended the bill by adding to it $50,000, making the sum in all $150,000.

Now it seems to me that, upon the information now in the possession of the Indian Committee, and I presume the Committee on Appropriations is in possession of the same information, by the 1st of April these Indians will be without any food at all. Now, why will not the Committee on Appropriations consent to this amendment of the Senate; because they have this whole matter in their own hands, and when an appropriation shall be made for the next fiscal year they can deduct any amount now appropriated in excess of what is needed?

Mr. HOLMAN. In appropriating for the Indians you may take it for granted that every dollar will be expended, and that very promptly;

there is no chance of anything lapping over.

Mr. PAGE. I take it for granted that any appropriation made for a particular purpose will only be expended for the purpose for which is appropriated, and that this appropriation would only be used for the immediate necessities of the Indians.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman forgets the very case before us, that these Indians were taken to the council in violation of law.

Mr. SEELYE. Allow me one moment simply to say that, without waiting for any estimate from the Department, it is a simple sum which we can calculate for ourselves. There are 19,000 Indians there now. Here is the statement of the agent dated February 24, 1876:

Over one thousand Indians from the north have arrived in obedience to your request, communicated to them by couriers sent from here. More are daily expected.

Now these 19,000 Indians to be supported from now until the 30th of June would cost about $5 a piece with a prospect of more. Whether that is an adequate supply for furnishing them or not, the House can say. But with this statement I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman, ] and as the bill has gone before the Senate with the prospect that a conference will be asked by that body, I beg to withdraw the motion I have presented.

IMPORTATION OF ALCOHOLIC LAQUORS.

Mr. BANKS. I hold in my hand a petition of four lines signed by nearly three thousand women of Massachusetts. It is a remarkably short document, considering that it expresses the opinions of so many women. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It is a remarkably women the encouragement given by the Government of the United States to the manufacture and importation of spirituous liquors for the purpose of increasing its revenues, and asking for the restriction of the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors to the quantity required for medicinal and mechanical purposes

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the four lines.

The Clerk read as follows:

We, the undersigned, women of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Massachusetts. and others, respectfully pray for legislation respecting the manufacture of intoxicating liquors and the importation thereof into the United States to such an amount only as shall be required for mechanical or chemical purposes and in the arts.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS BY RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2815) fixing the compensation of railroad companies for the transportation of the United States mails; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee of Accounts be, and they are hereby, authorized to fix the pay of the special messenger and watchman of the Committee of Investigation of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and to report the same to this House.

JURISDICTION OF COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to make a brief explanation in regard to it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Territories has exclusive jurisdiction of the question of the organization of a territorial government in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to make a few words of explanation. On the 12th day of January, Mr. Franklin, of Missouri, introduced House bill No. 943, for the organization of the territorial government in the Indian Territory, which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and that committee has since been considering that bill. Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to this resolution if it does not give rise to debate.

Mr. PAGE. I shall object to it if it is debated at all, unless the Committee on Indian Affairs can be heard. Mr. SOUTHARD. Certainly the Committee on Indian Affairs will be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it gives rise to debate, I must object.
Mr. SOUTHARD. Is the objection in time?
The SPEAKER. It is; the resolution was read merely for informa-

Mr. EDEN. I ask permission to introduce a joint resolution for reference only Mr. SOUTHARD. Cannot the House act on this resolution without further debate? The SPEAKER. Not unless the several objections and demands are withdrawn

Mr. HURLBUT. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. EDEN] to submit a joint resolution for reference only.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now call for the regular order of business.
Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to introduce a bill for reference

Mr. FOSTER. Wait until Monday next, when the States will be

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged question and in order.

ELECTION CONTEST-BROMBERG VS. HARALSON.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections unanimously to submit a report with accompanying resolutions, and I move that the report and resolutions be printed and laid on the table.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Frederick G. Bromberg was not elected a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the first congressional district of Alabama.

Resolved, That Jere Haralson was elected a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the first congressional district of Alabama.

The report and accompanying resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST-FINLEY VS. WALLS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to submit a report with accompanying resolutions, and to move that the report and resolutions be printed and laid on the table.

The resolutions were read, as follows

Resolved, That Josiah T. Walls was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Resolved, That Josse J. Finley was elected and is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire on behalf of the minority of the Committee of Elections to submit a report with accompanying resolutions in this case, which I move be printed with the majority

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That J. J. Finley was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in this Resolved, That Josiah T. Walls was elected and is entitled to a seat in this and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I give notice that as soon as I think members have had an opportunity to examine these reports after they shall have been printed, I will call them up for action.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to suggest that Mr. Walls, the sitting member in the Florida case, is quite unwell, and although he is now able to be here the first time for ten days, he may need a little time in preparing his case.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It will be some time before these reports

Mr. STEVENSON. Is there a minority report in the case of Bromborg vs. Haralson?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That was a unanimous report.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same: An act (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia.

CHARGES AGAINST GEORGE F. SEWARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of February ultimo, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State and the papers which accompany it.

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1876.

The subject of the message is the charges against George F. Seward, late consular-general at Shanghai, and now United States minister to China.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POST-TRADER AT FORT CONCHA, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of all papers pertaining to Joseph Loeb, post-trader at Fort Concha, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

ALABAMA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, a report of the Chief of Engineers on the examination of the Alabama River from Wetumpka to its mouth; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking up bills on the Speaker's table and referring them to the appropriate committees? There was no objection.

ARSENAL AT STONINGTON, CONNECTICUT.

Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated:

A bill (S. No. 63) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, deceased—Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith-Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 591) to regulate the transportation of bonded merchandise withdrawn from warehouse-Committee of Ways and Means.

REDUCTION OF EXPENSES OF CUSTOMS COLLECTION.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at one o'clock; and the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a public

Mr. DIBRELL, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1905 a bill (H. R. No. 2816) to reduce the expense of collecting customs; which was read a first

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the bill be printed and recommitted, and that the committee have leave to report it back at any time.

The bill was read. The first section provides that from and after the passage of the act no officer of the United States at any port of entry or port of delivery, acting in the capacity of collector of customs, appraiser, surveyor, or otherwise, at said port of entry or port of delivery, in the United States or in any of the Territories thereof, shall be allowed a salary or any fees to be paid by the United States in excess of the gross customs receipts or dues collected at said port of entry or port of delivery.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to contract with such collectors, receivers, appraisers, and surveyors of customs at any port of entry or delivery where the amount of customs heretofore received has not been sufficient to pay the fees and salaries allowed by law upon such terms as he may think reasonable; but in no case shall such officer be allowed more than the gross receives of the United States at such part of entry or delivery.

the into case shall such officer be allowed more than the gross receipts of the United States at such port of entry or delivery.

The third section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to consolidate any of the districts or ports of entry or ports of delivery at such times and in such manner as he may in his judgment deem for the best interests of the service; but the Secretary of the Treasury is not to abolish or consolidate any port of entry or delivery when the services of a collector appraisary or surveyer or other person can be obtained for an lector, appraiser, or surveyor, or other person can be obtained for an amount not exceeding the receipts at such port.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, is this bill reported for consideration now? I understood the gentleman to ask that it be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] to request action on the bill at this time; but there is such confusion in the Hall that it is impossible for the Chair to hear distinctly the remarks of gentlemen on the outer row of seats.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask that the bill be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Public Expenditures, with leave to report it back at any time.

I object to the leave to report back at any time.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will be printed and recommitted. Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill whether he does not think it better that the Committee of Ways and Means should consider the bill. The question which it presents has heretofore been an embarrassing one to that committee; and as it relates to the collection of the revenues of the United States, it is so immediately within the province of that committee that jurisdiction of the question has never before been taken by any other committee. The importance of the matter I am familiar with through the inquiries of a former Ways and Means Committee, and while I have no wish to make any motion in conflict with that of the gentle-man reporting this bill, I think that on further reflection it will appear very desirable in the judgment of the gentleman's own committee that the committee having charge of the customs should consider this sub-

As I heard the bill read, it appeared to me that in many portions of the country where the question is one of guarding against smuggling and not of collecting revenue it would practically open up those ports to free smuggling. As the questions involved are so important, and as the Committee of Ways and Means has heretofore had it under consideration, it seems to me that unless the Committee on Public Expenditures has made a study of the whole system of customs and the revenue from importations, the House would be glad to have the judgment of the Committee of Ways and Means on the bill. I merely make this suggestion; I have no motion to make.

Mr. DIBRELL. I object to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, for if it goes there it will be the last of it. The third section has been added in accordance with a suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, contained in an official let-ter. I think the matter has properly been considered by the Committee on Public Expenditures, who are unanimously in favor of the bill. I hope it will be recommitted to our committee.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I concur in the view taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] as to the proper jurisdiction of this question. It was considered by the Committee of Ways and Means in the last Congress, in connection with the matter of fees and salaries. It has an intimate connection with the question of smuggling and the question of proper compensation. I think it is far better it should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, who are in direct communication with these officers of the Treasury having charge of this subject. I think at least it should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means for their consideration, and if they think it is a proper subject for the Committee on Public Expenditures to take jurisdiction of, I then shall have no objection to its being referred to the gentleman's committee.

Mr. DIBRELL. The bill saves to the Government $200,000. We have been in consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the bill has been carefully considered by the committee.

The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

ALE OF GOVERNMENT LANDS AT VINCENNES, INDIANA.

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reorted back a bill (H. R. No. 192) authorizing the sale of certain

The preamble recites that the United States heretofore acquired for debt, through the intervention of trustees, certain real estate in and near the city of Vincennes, Knox County, Indiana, consisting of and near the city of Vincennes, Knox County, Indiana, consisting of about eighty acres of land, more or less, survey No. 5, township No. 3 north, range 10 west, second meridian, together with the half of lot No. 1 and the whole of lot No. 8, of Harrison's addition to said city of Vincennes, commonly called "The Steam-mill tract," or "Hall Neilson property;" and that the Ohio and Mississippi Railway Company, the Evansville and Crawfordsville Railroad Company, and the Indianapolis and Vincennes Railroad Company have severally placed Indianapolis and Vincennes Railroad Company have severally placed their tracks, switches, and certain buildings on said land while the title to the same was disputed; and it is desirable that said companies shall continue to occupy such portions of said land as may be necessary for the successful operation of their railroad lines.

The bill then provides that the Solicitor of the Treasury, if in his judgment the interests of the United States require it, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may sell or cause to be sold at private sale, for not less than its appraised value, to be ascertained under the direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury, to said companies so much of the same as may be required for their tracks, switches, shops, and other railroad purposes; provided that the aggregate amount so sold shall not exceed one-third of the whole of said land; and provided further that the remaining portion of said real estate may be sold under existing laws as may be convenient and desirable.

Strike out "third" in the eleventh line and insert "fourth."
Strike out all after the word "estate" in the twelfth line and insert "shall be subdivided, appraised, and sold to the highest bidder, after giving three months' public notice in one of the public newspapers published in the city of Vincennes, Indiana: Provided, That no portion of said lands shall be sold for less than its appraised value: And provided, That this actshall not prejudice any adverse claim or right to said lands.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered by the House that this bill was reported by me from the Committee on Private Land Claims about the 10th of last month. There seemed then to be some misapprehension as to whether the design of the committee, although it had given careful consideration to the subject as provided for in the bill, was not in conflict with existing law, and whether there was not involved in some way homestead pre-emption or mili-tary reservation such as would preclude the right under the existing law of the Solicitor of the Treasury to sell at private sale. In order to correct the misapprehension and to show that there is existing law governing this case, I will ask the Clerk to read section 3749 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3749. The Solicitor of the Treasury is authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to rent, for a period not exceeding three years, or to sell, at public sale, any unproductive lands, or other property of the United States acquired under judicial process or otherwise in the collection of debts, after advertising the time, place, and conditions of such sale for three months preceding the same in some newspaper published in the vicinity thereof, in such manner and upon such terms as may, in his judgment, be most advantageous to the public interest.

Mr. PARSONS. It will be observed that the main portion of the amendment added to the original bill after reconsideration by the Committee on Private Land Claims is simply in accordance with the existing law of the land, a law which was in existence at the time the original report was made. There is not now and was not then any divergence from the law and practice which had been carefully weighed by the committee. Those present who remember the original report will recollect that this land was covered into the Treasury, so to speak, because of debts due from the Bank of Vincennes, a depository of public funds; that it was never any part of the public domain, but an old French grant. The title is in the United States, and the bill as now amended complies with existing law. Unless some gentleman wishes to be heard on the question, I will demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether in the adjudication in favor of the United States there was any right of redemption or reversionary interest to heirs or other per-

Mr. PARSONS. The original bill shows fully that the United States is the sole owner, and that there is no dispute as to the title. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] were here, he would corroborate what I have stated, as he has fully examined the subject. The rate what I have stated, as he has fully examined the subject. The title I believe is in the United States, but in the amendment there is a provision reserving any question of private rights.

Mr. CONGER. If that be so, then I do not object.

Mr. PARSONS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered;

and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to; and, as amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

Mr. PARSONS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. BOONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1297) prohibiting the cutting of pine timber on any Indian reservation or lands to which the Indian title or right of occupancy has not been extinguished, reported it back with amendments.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall not be lawful for any agent or officer of the Government, unless especially authorized thereunto by act of Congress, to sell, or authorize the sale, or the cutting or removal of any timber on any Indian reservation, or from any lands to which the Indian title or right of occupancy has not been extinguished.

It provides in its second section that it shall not be lawful for any person to cut or remove, from any such reservation or lands, any timber thereon, or remove therefrom any logs or lumber cut or manufactured from timber which grew thereon.

In its third section all sales or transfers, and all contracts relating to or concerning any transfer of any logs, timber, or lumber cut or manufactured from timber taken from any such reservations or lands are declared null and void, unless the same shall be authorized by special act of Congress.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows: After the word "extinguished," in section 1, line 8, add these words: "and the title to which may hereafter revert to the Government of the United States."

In section 2, line 2, strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and;" so that it will read, "it shad not be lawful for any person to cut and remove," &c. Add the following proviso:

Provided. That this act shall not be construed to prevent Indians or other perresourced, that this act shall not be construed to prevent indians or other persons who are bone fide residents upon such Indian reservatio. s from cutting and using such of the timber growing thereon as may be necessary for agricultural and mechanical purposes: And providing also, That when deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Interior for the public service he may authorize the sale of timber, for the use of steamboats only, on such reservations on the Missouri River.

Mr. BOONE. By a former action of the House this bill was amended so that the word "pine" was stricken from the bill, and it was made to apply to all kinds of timber. In that condition it was recommitted to the committee, who have directed me to report the amendments which have been read.

I will state for the information of the House that the reason for the first amendment arose from the fact that in New York there was a certain reservation, the ultimate title to which when the Indian title is extinguished will go to a company; and in order to avoid any interference with that, we make the bill simply apply to that class of Indian reservation the ultimate title to which may revert to the United States.

There was a further objection to the bill indicated by the honorable gentleman from Texas, [Mr. Reagan, ] which was that Congress had no right to interfere with this timber upon the Indian lands, in consequence of what he conceived to be a constitutional difficulty. Upon that I simply desire to remark that in 19 Wallace in the case of The United States vs. Cook this question was before the Supreme Court of the United States and was definitely settled. The Supreme Court emphatically decided in that case that the titles that the Indians have in the reservations are simply possessory, and as the ultimate title will, when they are extinguished, revert to the Government of the United States, that even for timber which has already been cut by the Indians, or other persons, the Government still has title to it, by the Indians, or other persons, the Government still has title to it, and may maintain an action of replevin for it or claim and delivery of personal property as we have it in Kentucky; so that the objection suggested by the honorable gentleman from Texas I think presents no difficulty in the way of the passage of this bill.

The whole purpose of this bill, I will state further, is to prevent the destruction of timber upon these lands. It is said that if we pass this bill the Indians will be debarred from pursuing what they have heretofore pursued as a matter of profit to themselves—what they call "logging" in the Territories. The evidence before the committee establishes the fact that not only the logging but the log-rolling on the principal part of this timber land is done by persons who are speculating in the timber by and with the consent, I am sorry to say, in some instances, of the Indian agent. Whether he is interested in these contracts or not, of course I do not pretend to say. But that the timber, all the valuable timber, on these lands will ultimately be destroyed, unless there is some stop put to it by law, there can be no possible doubt. I think, therefore, there can be no reasonable objection to the passage of a bill like this.

Mr. CONGER. I approve of the object of this bill and concur in its provisions. But it seems to me that there are one or two matters that should have received the consideration of the committee and been that should have received the consideration of the committee and been provided for further than has been done in the bill or amendments, and one of these was alluded to by the gentleman who reports the bill, but was not sufficiently explained.

On some of these reservations the Government has erected sawmills at the expense of, or with the money of, the Indians, and has sent proper persons to manage those mills and to teach the Indians how to manufacture lumber. In the clearing of land, which the Government encourages, the pine in many cases is taken for the purpose of clearing, and is sawed in these mills erected by the Government for these Indians. I submit to the gentleman that if this lumber were used for any other purpose than for the immediate use of the Indians upon the reservation, all that class of business in any reservation must be stopped. I think that such cases ought to be provided for more fully than they are in the bill.

There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman. All persons who are familiar with the growth and decay of pine timber, and especially with its destruction after fires have passed through pine forests, are aware that, when a fire has raged through a pine forest, the first year thereafter a large portion of the timber is destroyed and rendered worthless by worms boring into the timber, and the second year invariably the entire mass of timber that has been burned over is destroyed so as to be utterly useless for any has been burned over is destroyed so as to be utterly useless for any purpose except for fuel or rails; that it is utterly useless for lumber. Now on these reservations in the pine lands they are subject always, from accident and other causes, to the ravages of fire. I see no reason why, if on an Indian reservation fire has spread and destroyed millions of feet, as it may well do in one fire, of fine timber, so that the first year a large portion was destroyed by the natural enemy, the worm, and the second year destroyed by the same cause—why there should not be in such an exclusive bill as this some provision that there might be some authority vested sequently a preserve the value there might be some authority vested somewhere to preserve the value of the timber in the burned district to the Indian tribe occupying the reservation.

Every man familiar with the subject knows that the ravages of fire destroy in the Northwestern States millions and millions of dollars' worth of property every year, or would destroy it except that those who are the owners of the property are compelled to place force enough in the woods to take out the timber the first year or in the second year after the fire.

I submit then that, in view of the loss of so much value as might

I submit then that, in view of the loss of so much value as might occur on these Indian reservations, we should lodge with some power the right to allow the Indians to save that which would otherwise be utterly lost to them and to everybody else. If the committee have not taken that subject into consideration, I submit that it is a very important one, as every one living in the pine regions knows it to be; and, while you protect the living pine, I see no reason why we should condemn to utter loss such portions as may have been injured by fire, and which may be made available for timber within two years after the ravages by fire. I see no provision in the bill for any such contingency, but in all such cases it must necessarily await the action of Congress.

Now I submit that in many such cases the time when the destruction by fire took place and the extent of that destruction might not be ascertained sufficiently here to make proper provision for it by a I do not suggest where this power should special act of Congress. lie. There must somewhere in the Government be some power adapted to meet such emergencies as that, and perhaps save to the tribe many thousands of dollars from their loss of timber. I make the sug-I make the suggestion merely. I make no motion in regard to it.

Mr. BOONE. I would simply remark in reference to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan that to adopt his view of it would simply, in my opinion, allow the very means to be used which we are now trying to prevent in order to stop the destruction of this To designing parties who desire to get timber it is an easy matter to cause fires to pass through the reservation; and, if it is the law that all dead timber may be made up into lumber and hauled off as a matter of speculation, I would venture the assertion that you as a matter of speculation, I would venture the assertion that you would find no difficulty in giving employment for a large number of saw-mills in sawing up the dead timber on these reservations.

I think, therefore, it better to prohibit all persons from dealing in this kind of timber at all. I think it is better for the Indians and better for the Government that the timber should lie there and rot, or stand there and rot, than to allow persons to go there under the pretense of taking off the dead timber, to mutilate or carry off the other timber. The interest of the Indians does not demand, so far as I have been able to find out or believe, that speculation in timber shall be resorted to at all. What we want to do is to furnish them with homes, and the best method is to preserve intact, not only the growing, but every other character of timber on their lands. That is the ordinary course that farmers pursue in reference to their lands and that is the course we ought to pursue in reference to these Indian lands. I think, therefore, that there would be danger in adoptdian lands. I think, therefore, that there would be danger in adopting the suggestion of my friend from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. It is very true that it might lead to the destruction of timber by fire set on purpose, but there are in the pine lands valuable regions of fine pine, but which the moment the pine is removed are utterly worthless for any purpose whatever. Lands worth $25, $30, and even $100 an acre for the standing pine upon them in the three Northwestern pine-growing States, when the pine is removed some of them are not worth ten cents an acre. It is so in the Indian reservations. Now it may be that it is better that the entire valua of the mare not worth ten cents an acre. It is so in the indian reservations. Now, it may be that it is better that the entire value of the growing timber and the burning timber shall be lost than to encourage a violation of law by inducing men to set fire to the pine forests. I thought differently, and therefore I made these suggestions.

Mr. BOONE. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to. The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Does the title need amendment?

Mr. BOONE. I move to amend the title by striking out the word

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that, inasmuch as the bill has been amended so as to make it refer only to reservations to which the Indian title has been extinguished and which would revert to the United States, words indicating that should be added.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the words "and for other purposes" would cover everything.

Mr. CONGER. I agreent that.

Mr. CONGER. I accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, re ported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1942) to re-enact and continue in force the act of June 23, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy;" and moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill proposes to grant away land belonging to the Government, and I think needs some explanation. I suppose Mr. HARDENBERGH. This is a Senate bill, and it came over here ith a printed report.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have had no opportunity to examine it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will sustain the point of order, and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I ask that the report and the letter of the Secretary of War in relation thereto be read.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order, the bill having been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] withdrew his point of order until the report was

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not. I think there should be time to examine the bill and report.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the military road from Astoria to Salem, in the State of Oregon, constructed under the following acts of Congress approved February 17, 1855, March 2, 1857, and June 14, 1858, shall be donated to the several counties in said State through which it runs, to wit: Clatsop, Washington, Yam Hill, and Polk, to each such portion as runs through it; that the said counties hereafter shall own and control the same; and that it shall be abandoned as a military road.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The only question involved in this bill is whether the Government shall continue to keep up this military road and the bridges on it, or allow the counties in Oregon through which it runs to maintain it at their own expense.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THORNBURGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT LARAMIE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 361) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill reduces the military reservation of Fort Laramie, in the Territory of Wyoming, to an area of fifty-four square miles; and provides that the said reservation shall, after the passage of the act, be limited and bounded as described and declared in executive order of

The second section provides that all that portion of land added to the reservation of Fort Laramie by executive order of April 2, 1872, shall be eliminated therefrom and restored to the body of the public lands, subject to all provisions of the laws of the United States re-lating to the public lands, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said lands had never constituted a portion of said military reservation.

Mr. COOK. The only question involved in this bill is this: Before 1869 a military reservation was established at Fort Laramie, embracing fifty-four square miles. Subsequently, in 1872, the reservation was extended by an order issued, under the direction of the President, by the War Department for the purpose of giving the Government the control and protection of the Indian agency near there from intruders. Since that time the Indian agency has been removed a hundred miles farther distant, and the Secretary of War, together with General Sheridan, who is in command of that department, say that there is no reason and propriety for continuing this reservation with its present limits, but recommend that it be reduced to its original its present limits, but recommend that it be reduced to its original limits, and that the additional land shall be restored to the public lands and be subject to the provisions of law relating to the public lands. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. COOK also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 147) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay the expenses incurred by the State of Oregon and the citizens of California in suppressing Indian hostilities in the States of Oregon and California in the years 1872 and 1873.

Mr. COOK. As this bill makes an appropriation, I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the accompanying report be printed. The motion was agreed to.

DEPOSITS BY ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H.

R. No. 2121) to authorize commissioned officers of the Army to make deposits under the act of May 15, 1872.
 The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill authorizes commissioned officers of the Army to make deposits of money with any Army paymaster, and makes applicable to such deposits the provisions and restrictions of the act of May 15, 1872, establishing a system of deposits, and authorizes the officers to withdraw their deposits on the completion of each and every term of five years' service, commencing from the date of their first deposit under the act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H.R. No. 816) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides that section 1218 of the Revised Statutes be repealed.

Mr. PAGE. What is the section which this bill proposes to repeal? Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. It is as follows:

No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United

That act was passed in 1866. Most of the persons originally affected by it have, with few exceptions, had their legal and political disabilities removed; and I suppose there is no more objection to their holding a military office than to their filling a civil position.

Mr. HURLBUT. At what time was this bill considered by the Military Committee?

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. While you were absent in Illinois.

Mr. HURLBUT. All right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1806, a bill (H. R. No. 2817) to regulate the pay and allowances of Army officers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That, at all posts and stations where there are no public quarters, officers may be furnished with quarters in kind by the Quartermaster's Department as now allowed by regulations: Provided, That the amount paid is not in excess of $12 per room per month, except at San Francisco, where the amount s all not be in excess of $15 per room per month: And further provided, That the allowance of rented quarters and fuel shall not increase the pay and allowances of any officer beyond the sum of $5,00.

SEC. 5 That so much of the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, as authorized regimental adjutants and quartermasters to be extra lieutenants, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That the officers now holding said positions shall not be displaced from the grades of first or second lieutenant, respectively, as now held, but assigned, without prejudice to their rank, to the first vacancies occurring among the lieutenants of their respective grades.

SEC. 6. That all chaplains hereafter appointed shall be appointed for a term of four years only, subject to re-appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 7. That sections 1261 and 1271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are here.

and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are here-by, repealed.

Mr. HURLBUT. I rise to a privileged question. The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES

Mr. HURLBUT. There was a special order set for to-day, the bill for the equalization of bounties. I desire to say that my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Thornburgh,] whose bill has been adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs, is unable to take charge of it to-day. I ask that this special order be postponed until next Tuesday at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. BANNING. I suggest to the gentleman to fix Wednesday.

Mr. KEHR. There is a special order for next Tuesday, the steamboat bill having been assigned for that day.

Mr. HURLBUT. Very well; I will say Wednesday, with the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 58) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union will be postponed until next Wednesday and be made a special order for that day at two o'clock, with all the privileges which it now

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. Hamilton of New Jersey, Mr. Randall, and Mr. Wheeler as the committee of conference on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30,

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was presented by U. S. GRANT, jr., one of his secretaries; who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great

An act (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania:

An act (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877;

An act (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Frances C. Elliott; and An act (H. R. No. 1962) to confirm certain school-indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BOONE. I rise to a privileged question. The bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour. The bill No. 58 had been made a special order previously, but I understand is now post-poned. I want to know whether it is now in order to take up House

The SPEAKER. The response of the Chair is that in reference to all these special orders it is within the power of the House to take up and consider just such business as it pleases. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. That motion is in order, notwithstanding the special orders.

Mr. BOONE. I hope that motion will not be pressed. The bill which I have named is an important matter, and has been made a special order for to-day. I would like to have it taken up.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending my motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I move that all general debate on the legislative appropriation bill be terminated in two hours and a half.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I had desired to make some general remarks on this appropriation bill; but as the time has been limited, and a great many gentlemen are anxious to make speeches, I find I cannot have the opportunity. I therefore ask the privilege of having printed in the RECORD some remarks I had wished to make on this appropriation bill and kindred subjects.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a wide range. Since the bill came before the committee for its consideration we have had speeches and dissertations upon every conceivable subject connected with the Union and all its varied and diversified interests. I propose in the time allotted to me to claim the attention of the House to several clauses of the bill itself. The Committee on Appropriations are doing a good work in retrenchment and reform, and deserve the countenance and support of all who favor an economical and honest administration of the Government, without regard to party. In the Military Academy bill, in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and in the fortification bill, the only three passed appropriation bill, and in the fortification bill, the only three passed up to this time, they have saved on the same appropriations of last year $1,288,246.50. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, now under consideration, they propose to reduce the expenditures of last year $5,724,417.39, which will be a reduction of the estimates this year to the amount of $7,826,499.89. Now, sir, this proposition deserves our serious attention, and I trust will in the main receive a cordial support, both in this House and in the Senate. test can now be made as to the sincerity of the professions in the way of retrenchment and reform.

To enable the committee to reach these conclusions and recommend so large a reduction in this bill it was necessary to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department. question of the gravest importance both to the country and to the Indian, who is directly to be affected by it. The Committee on Indian Affairs have given this subject much consideration, and they have sought for and obtained the opinions of men, both soldiers and civilians, of the largest experience and the maturest judgment in all matters pertaining to the solution of the Indian question, which all admit is most important and difficult. These gentlemen have differed much in their opinions; but, after weighing the whole together with much solicitude and care, the majority of the committee have reached the conclusion that the transfer is demanded by the best interest alike of the Indian and the Government. Under the present system the business of feeding, clothing, educating, civilizing, and christianizing the Indians is intrusted to agents from civil life, who are selected by the different religious bodies and nominated by them to the President, who upon such nomination makes the appointment.

The agencies are divided among and assigned to the different religious bodies, and this division and assignment are recognized and accepted by them all, with the distinct understanding, to which custom has given all the sanctions of law, that each church is to have sole control of its own agency. Thus we have in the Indian Territory sectarian agencies filled by sectarian agents. To illustrate, a vacancy occurs in an agency. The particular sect to which it has been assigned is notified that they must make a nomination and upon this nomination the President appoints. No other sect can or will be heard as to this appointment. There may be and doubtless are thousands without the pale of that church who are as well and in many respects better qualified, but that will have no weight in determining the appoint-The agent must be recommended by that church, and through him and with the money furnished by the Government this particular sect or church carries their missionary operations among the Indians at this point.

To prove this I quote the language of the Commissioner on Indian Affairs on page 23 of his report for the year 1875. After saying that no desire for church propagation on the part of any religious denomina-tion, with one exception, has in any way interfered with the purposes of the Government, he adds this language:

At the several agencies assigned to the care of the Catholics no restriction has been placed upon their system and methods of education, and no other religious body, so far as I am aware, has in any way attempted to interfere. I regret to say this is not true, so far as the Catholics are concerned, of some of the agencies assigned to other religious bodies.

If more proof were needed it can be found, I apprehend, in the evidence of all the religious denominations, that in the agencies assigned to them they expect no interference, and any effort in that way by others is regarded as an intrusion upon their rights, and it is made the subject of complaint.

Now, sir, the Constitution declares that no religious tests shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States, and Congress shall pass no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

In this system the Constitution is violated in spirit and letter. This is a Government office, a public trust provided for by law, and it is filled, not from the people, but from a sect, which is to have exclusive charge of the agency. The body may act conscientiously, and doubtless do so far as they can, but it will be seen that however else qualified it is essential that the religions opinions of the agent must accord with the body appointing him and whose missionary work among the Indians he has in charge. Here, then, is a religious test of office distinctly, squarely, and confessedly made. Again, the Indians at this point must and will be taught the peculiar tenets and doctrines of the religious body to whom it has been assigned. This is expected, and not only expected, but encouraged as can be abundantly shown by the reports of the commissioners and by any and all the religious bodies themselves. At this point, then, the Government establishes one religion to the exclusion of all others. The poor Indian, who has been robbed of his lands, swindled out of his annuities, must now take such religion as the Government sends him. He can have no choice, and is not even allowed to hear any other gospel except such as his agent may profess. The Mohammedan in his conquests to propagate the religion of his prophet says, in his intolerance, "Death or the Koran." We, in christianizing the Indians, say to them, "Take the religion we send or nothing." It may be said that these agencies are equally divided and no preference is shown to one church or another. I am not advised as to the basis upon which this division is made; but not advised as to the basis upon which this division is made; but however this may be, it is no answer to the objection we have stated.

Now, sir, I would not be understood as underestimating the value and importance of the services rendered by these different religious bodies in the efforts of the Government to civilize the savage races. bodies in the efforts of the Government to civilize the savage races. They must have schools, they must have teachers and preachers, and they must be taught the Christian religion; and to have this efficiently and faithfully done we must in a great degree rely upon the noble and self-sacrificing men and women who, taking their lives in their hands, with no reward or hope of reward here, go out as missionaries of the Gospel among the Indians. But I would give all the largest liberty; I would open wide every door of access into that country and shut it to none. I would have the Government give its countenance and protection to all, and leave the results to their own faithfulness and energy, to the truth, and to God.

faithfulness and energy, to the truth, and to God.

But there is another objection to this, and that is the partisan character of the appointments. I do not charge this upon the churches. I doubt not they would have it different; but the faithful and active I doubt not they would have it different; but the latering and active partisan must have his reward, and these offices in the gift of the administration in power have been and will be filled by its own zealous adherents. I know, sir, this has been denied; but from information I have on the subject I apprehend upon an investigation it match I have on the subject I apprehend upon an investigation it will be found that few, if any, agents are appointed who are not in political accord with the party in power; and it is too often the case that when the man is found who will bear the test in religion and politics, he unites in himself all the qualities essential to secure the agency. It is unjust and bad enough to turn the poor, untutored Indian over to the sole control of a sectarian body, but it is a wrong which amounts to a crime to turn him over soul and body to a secta-rian and political zealot and bigot.

From such a source, unfaithful partisan agents, spring all or most of the ills to which Indian flesh is heir, and hence on every side we hear the robbery and plunder, suffering and starvation, of the Indian. This brings us to consider the fraud and corruption of the present system. Under a joint resolution of Congress adopted March 3, 1865, a committee of both Houses was appointed, consisting of Doolittle, Foster, Ross, Nesmith, Higby, WINDOM, and Hubbard, names well and most of them favorably known to the country, whose duty it was to in-quire into the condition of the Indian tribes, and their treatment by the civil and military authorities of the United States. Of this committee Senator Doolittle was chairman and made the report. Among the papers accompanying this report I find a subreport from Hon. J. W. Nesmith, one of the committee, to the chairman, from which I beg leave to read:

W. Nesmith, one of the committee, to the chairman, from which I beg leave to read:

Another great cause of complaint is the worthless quality of the goods which are bought in the Atlantic States and sent out for distribution among them. There is a great fault somewhere, either on the part of the agents who make the purchases in the eastern market, or on the part of the merchants or contractors who supply the goods. From the personal inspection which I have given those goods, and on comparing them with the invoices, I am thoroughly convinced that the contractors are guilty of the most outrageous and systematic swindling and robbery. Their acts can be properly characterized by no other terms. There is evidence also that the persons employed in the Department to make the purchases are accomplices in these crimes. I have examined invoices of purchases made by the Department or its agents in eastern cities, where the prices charged were from 50 to 100 per cent. above the market value of good articles. Upon an examination of the goods I have found them, as a general thing, worthless and deficient in quantity. Among them were "steel spades," made of sheet-iron; "chopping axes," which were purely castivon; "best brogans," with paper soles; "blankets," made of shoddy and glue, which came to shreis the first time they were wet, &c.

But the folly or wrong of these purchases, made by dishonest agents from dishonest contractors, does not cease here. Many articles are purchased which would be utterly useless to the Indians if their quality was ever so good, such as iron spoons, mirrors, gimlets, Jew's-harps, hair-oil, finger-rings, and, in one case which came under my observation, forty dozen pairs of elastic garters were sent out to a tribe in which there was not a single pair of stockings. Agent Wilbur, in charge of the Yakama reservation, in a report upon this subject, says:

"The goods furnished from the Atlantic States have been of an inferior quality. often damaged, and sometimes short in quantity. Of the first invoic

Here we have Jew's-barps. Very well, let them have Jew's-harps. It is said music hath charms to soothe the savage breast, and I will not object to music. Here, too, we have hair-oil, [laughter,] and fingerrings, and, among other things, forty thousand pairs of elastic garters.
[Great laughter.] What advance in civilization does this demonstrate? It would seem in all the ornaments of the person and conveniences of dress they have reached a point in which they equal if not surpass our own fair daughters. Fearing some of my bachelor friends may not understand this, I will tell them that when they sent these forty thousand pairs of elastic garters they were just about as useful as if they had sent so many shoe-strings and no shoes, or a as useful as it they had sent so many snoe-strings and no snoes, or a lot of linchpins without wheels; for with all these forty thousand pairs of garters not a single pair of stockings was sent. [Laughter.] My friend suggests that the garters ought to be used to hang the parties who perpetrated so gross a fraud. In that I agree with him, and no doubt so will the House.

Then again, sir, at that time there was a law that thereafter no goods should be purchased by the Indian D. partment or its agents, for any tribe, except upon the written requisition of the superintendent in charge of the tribe. This law was violated, and the then Commissioner of Indian Affairs, William P. Dole, in spite of that law staring him in the face, made requisitions, not one of which had been recommended or prescribed by agents in charge of the tribes, as the law required. In that same report I find the following, showing the frauds in the transportation as well as in the goods:

In that same report 1 find the following, showing the frauds in the transportation as well as in the goods:

The time and manner in which the goods have been shipped have been most unfortunately chosen. The goods of 1863 were not only shipped by the costly isthmus route, but they were subject to exorbitant charge for packing, drayage, &c., (for detail of which see comparative schedule, marked G.) and the bulky mater of some of the articles was such as to make the freight a great deal more than the value of the goods delivered. Handled axes, hatchets, pitchforks, garden-hoes, &c., were packed in huge pine boxes, to be transported over the route from Baltimore and New York to Warm Springsand Umatilla. The transportation of the bulky wooden handles was five times the value of the articles, handle and all, after delivery, while the Indians would have thought it no hardship to have made the handles themselves out of the timber which grows upon their own reservation.

The purchases of 1864 were all shipped via Cape Horn and San Francisco to Salem. Salem was the proper destination of no part of the goods. Your familiar acquaintance with the country enables out osee at once the absurdity of shipping goods bound for Warm Springs or Umatilla up the Williamette River to Salem thence down the river to Portland again, toward their final destination. The goods designed for Siletz agency afford a still more marked instance of mismanagement. They have been transported from San Francisco to Salem at a cost of about $75 per ton, and now the most economical way to get them to their destination will probably be to ship them back to San Francisco again at like cost, and thence direct to Siletz at a cost of about $16 per ton. The only other alternative is to transport them on pack-mules from Salem to Siletz, which probably will not cost less than $100 per ton. In regard to the quality and suitableness of the goods shipped, it has generally been such as could have been anticipated where the purchaser was entirely unacquainted with th sary to point out all these failures or swindles, but a few of the most glaring must suffice.

Merrimae prints are named in the invoices of both years. This, as is well known, is the most costly sort of calico, and the prices paid have corresponded with the invoice quality, but not a yard of Merrimae calico has ever been put in the package; on the contrary, the article shipped has always been of a very inferior quality, such as can be bought for 25 or 30 per cent less than the Merrimae, and is worth to the Indians, who are expected to consume it, less than half. The article shipped as cotton duck was of a light and inferior article of common drilling. A considerable part of the thread sent out was rotten and utterly worthless. The needles, the buttons, the fish-hooks and lines were of the most inferior description, and of very little value to the Indians. Spoons enough were brought to give nearly half a dozen to every one of the tribe, and they were so worthless that the Indians generally refused to carry them away after they were given out. Fancy mirrors, costing $5 per dozen, were sent; they proved to be little looking-glasses about two inches in diameter, and worth absolutely nothing to the Ind' ns. A lot of steel weeding-hoes, handled, proved to be little laffairs, intended for 'he use of some delicate lady, if indeed they were intended for use at all. Scisson-and shears in inordinate quantity and utterly worthless in quality were sent. Tin. Tare, packed in roomy cases, until the freight was far in excess of the value. Fryingpans of thin sheet-iron, utterly worthless, and so esteemed by the Indians. In short, the entire purchases show either ignorance of the Indians' wants or design to defraud them. to defraud them

Huntingdon's requisitions of the 24th of September, 1863, were in the Department at Washington when the purchases of 1864 were made, and by reference to Huntingdon's schedule, which I append, it will be seen that Messrs. Dole and Gordon had as little comprehension of the requisition as they had regard for the law of Congress, which they were palpably violating. Huntingdon asked for "small steel ploughs," and they sent him "fancy mirrors;" he asked for "harness for ponies," and they sent him "frying-pans" and "knitting-needles;" he asked for "axes and grain cradles," and they responded with "scissors and iron spoons."

Thus it will be seen from this report that there had been frauds in quality, frauds in quantity, frauds in price; that there had been frauds in the purchaser, frauds in the seller, frauds in the agent, frauds in the superintendent, frauds in the trader at the post, frauds in the carrier in the route selected, and in the number of miles, and last, though not least, fraud strongly suspected, if not absolutely proved, in the Indian Commissioner, within two steps of the White House itself. But I desire to say here that no one suspected, no one believed, no one even intimated, that the occupants of the White House between 1862 and 1869 knew of or had any connection with these frands or any other. No, sir, it is but simple justice to them to say that they were not only honest but were above suspicion. There was a ring then as now, and it permeated the whole Indian Bureau with all its connections and agencies.

Again, sir, in 1868 a peace commission was appointed by the President, under an act of Congress, consisting of Generals Sherman, Harney, Terry, Augur, and others. Let us hear what they say after investigation as to the agents and men in the service of the Indian Burean:

The records are abundant to show that agents have pocketed the funds appropri The records are abundant to show that agents have pocketed the funds appropriated by the Government and driven the Indians to starvation. It cannot be doubted that Indian wars have originated from this cause. The Sioux war in Minnesota is supposed to have been produced in this way. For a long time these officers have been selected from partisan ranks, not so much on account of honesty or qualification as for devotion to party interests and their willingness to apply the money of the Indians to promote the selish schemes of local politicians. We do not doubt that some such men may be in the service of the Bureau now; and this leads us to suggest that Congress pass an act fixing a day (not later than the 1st of February, 1869) when the offices of all super intendents, agents, and special agents shall be vacated. Such persons as have proved themselves competent and faithful may be re-appointed. Those who have proved unit will find themselves removed without an opportunity to divert attention from their own unworthiness by professions of party zeal.

So thoroughly were the commissioners impressed with the fraud and corruption in this Bureau that they recommended that all the offices of the agents, special agents, and superintendents should be vacated; and the only criticism I would make upon this recommendation is that it was not as extensive as the facts demanded. It should have included all officers in the service of the Bureau.

This report came from men who opposed a transfer at that time of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and is therefore entitled the Indian Bureau to the war Department, and is therefore entitled to greater weight. Later in that year, after further investigation, they had a subsequent meeting and they changed their minds, and recommended by resolution that the transfer be made.

But it will be said by the opponents of this measure that all this took place before the present system of nomination by religious bodies had been inaugurated. I have already shown that from the nature of the case this change is not and cannot be a remedy; and in this opinion I am conclusively sustained by the facts.

In the spring of 1875 Professor Marsh, of Yale Scientific School, New Haven, Connecticut, a gentleman of high character as a scholar and as a man, visited Red Cloud agency on a scientific mission, and while there he came into possession of facts which showed frauds as he believed in the agents and the contractors. These facts with others afterward obtained led him to charge fraud not only at the agencies, but that these frauds were winked at by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Here we get in one step of the White House; from the last step God grant that the nation may ever, in accordance with truth and justice, be spared.

A commission was appointed, and upon it was placed a gentleman A commission was appointed, and upon it was placed a gentleman of high character and distinction, now on this floor, from West Vir-ginia. He can correct me if I am wrong. By their recommendation the agent and the inspector, nominated by a religious body, were both removed from office and two contractors forever excluded from any further contracts with the Government. They made no recommendation as to the Commissioner or the Secretary of the Interior.

But these high officers came out of the transaction badly damaged in reputation; dark suspicion with its horrid front and threatening aspect confronted them at every step; rumors were afloat in the atmosphere all around them; public confidence was shocked. The storm lowered, the muttering of the thunder was heard, and ere it breaks in all its fury upon their devoted heads they step down and out with certificates of good character in their pockets from the White House. Add to all this sworn testimony recently taken, and the conclusion is inevitable that the ring yet exists in all its power and has made fearful inroads upon the Treasury of the country. That there are honorable exceptious among the officers and employés of this Bureau I thankfully and cheerfully concede, and among them I would name the present Commissioner, who has been in office but a short time, and the board of commissioners, against whom I have not heard even so much as an intimation; but in spite of them the ring exists and its crushing weight felt and shared by both the Indians and the people.

But I am met just here, as I was in the committee, with this idea:

But I am met just here, as I was in the committee, with this idea: Granting all you say in view of the recent developments of fraud and peculation in the War Department, what will you gain by the transfer in this respect? I acknowledge the force of this argument, and at times I feel it is almost unanswerable. I confess, sir, while investigating this subject, when I remembered the poor Indian, how he had been robbed and plundered and oppressed; when I heard of the corruptions and frauds developed in the War Department in the person of its highest officer, only one step from the White House, my heart sayle within me: I almost despaired of relief for the Indian heart sank within me; I almost despaired of relief for the Indian.

In the Interior Department he and his people and the Government have been robbed, as he knows from his own sad experience. In the War Department, by the corruptions of the late Secretary, he finds the poor soldiers, the brave defenders of their country, by combinations and rings robbed of the small pittance they receive as pay. If he goes to the Post-Office Department, he hears of straw-bids and fraudulent contracts, by which the country has been defrauded of millions. If he turns, then, from earth to sea, and goes to the Navy, even there he finds the same evidences of fraud and corruption. If he goes to the State Department, he hears of the Emma mine and its frauds mentioned in connection with the name of our foreign minister to the court of England, to the dishonor and prejudice of our nation. Faint and sick at heart he turns from all these. A bright thought strikes him; he remembers his Great Father, who professedly so loves his red children, whom he calls the wards of the nation. With new hope and a quickened step he turns to the White House. Surely here he may find a resting-place and secure retreat from the frauds which are stary-

ing and dwarfing his people. Alas! alas! at the very threshold he meets the private secretary and the brother of the President, both dearer to the Great Father than his red children and wards. He recognizes the secretary as the man who, in the far West, was indicted for frauds on the revenue, and who was believed to have an intimate connection with the whisky ring, and he recognizes in both dealers in post-traderships and in other positions by which he has been swindled, and he learns that the Great Father is on guard, not watching the interests of his red children, wards of the nation, but watching for va-cancies in office, that he might be the first to notify his brother and aid him in securing it. Of course Orville made nothing by it, and the President knew it, his only object being to add another victim and martyr to the large number already taken from the Grant family who have sacrificed themselves alone for the good of their native country, in asking positions in the gift of the Great Father; but the poor Indian is not presumed to know this. He turns away in despair. He is hedged in by sea and land. Whither shall he flee to escape the trader and the agent and their accomplices? If he takes the wings of the morning, and flees to the utmost parts of the earth, even there a post-trader shall minister to him and a contractor shall guide him. In the depths of his despair and misery he may well exclaim:

Me miserable! which way shall I fly?

Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell; And, in the lowest deep, a lower deep, Still threat ning to devour me, opens wide.

But, sir, "hope springs eternal in the human breast," and I will not, I—for the sake of the Indian and the honor of my country—dare not despair. I answer the argument, make the transfer as asked for in this bill, and we will do what the peace commissioners recommended in 1863, as already referred to. We will vacate every office in all its various branches connected with the Indian Bureau. We will turn out every employé from cellar to garret, from turret to foundation-stone, from the highest to the lowest, from the jolly, portly old rat that devours his cheese in a night to the diminutive little mouse whose nibbling thefts are barely visible. All, all shall go; and when it is all swept and garnished, we will replace them with Army officers who are already paid, who are proverbial for honor and high integrity, and whose rigid code of laws will tolerate no conduct or behavior unbe-coming an officer and a gentleman. With the true soldier covetous-ness is contemned, avarice despised, and illiberality regarded as mean-ness. Careful of their own honor, they infringe not upon the honor or the rights of thers. Quick to resent an insult, when avenged they are equally quick to forgive and to forget. Prompt to guard and defend the life and honor of the nation, when done, they are the best conservators of peace. These are the characteristics of the true soldier, and I trust and believe we have many bright examples in our We trust to them the life and honor of the nation and feel secure; cannot we also intrust to their care and proverbial generosity the poor abused and down-trodden Indians?

But it has been said, and will be said again, that they believe too much in war, and if we want peace we must have civilians, and I find it usual with the officers who are interested in the continuance of the Indian Bureau to attribute all the wars with Indians to the Army. With a holy horror they detail the cruelties of the "Cheyenne war in 1864, culminating in the massacre at Sand Creek of one hundred and twenty friendly Indians, mostly women and children, resting in their own hunting-grounds under the protection of our flag, known as the Chivington massacre." They tell of the Sioux war in 1852 and 1854, costing from $20,000,000 to $40,000,000, and the loss of several hundred lives. They tell with great gusto of the Chevenne war that followed in 1867, in which we lost three hundred soldiers and spent millions of money, while but six Indians were killed; of the Navajo war in New Mexico, and all the other Indian wars. They tell us that it has cost the United States in these wars $1,000,000 to kill one Indian, and gravely shake their heads and say the Army did this, and therefore humanity and religion rise up alike in holy horror at this transfer. Now let us look at the facts of the case and see who is responsible for the horrors of war, and to whom we are indebted for the blessings of peace.

Mr. Doolittle, chairman of the Joint Special Committee on the Condition of the Indian Tribes in 1867, says in his report:

The committee are of opinion that in a large majority of cases Indian wars are to be traced to the aggressions of lawless white men, always to be found upon the frontier, or boundary-line between savage and civilized life. Such is the statement of the most experienced officers of the Army, and of all those who have been long conversant with Indian affairs.

Colonel Kit Carson, who has lived upon the plains and in the mountains since 1826, and has been all that time well acquainted with the Indian tribes in peace and in war, confirms this statement. He says: "As a general thing the dificulties arise from aggressions on the part of the whites." "The whites are always cursing the Indians, and are not willing to do them justice."

The Indian peace commission, in their report of 1868, say, as I have already quoted:

It cannot be doubted that Indian wars have originated from this cause. The Sioux war, in Minnesota, is supposed to have been produced in this way. It was Colorado troops that involved us in the war of 1864-'65 with the Cheyennes. It was a regiment of hundred-day men that perpetrated the butchery at Sand Creek, and took from the Treasury millions of money. A regiment of Montana troops, last September, would have involved us in an almost interminable war with the Crows but for the timely intervention of the military authorities.

These extracts taken from reports, all of which when made were against the transfer and a part of which were devoted to an argument against it, should prove conclusively that the regular Army was not responsible for the war but were the conservators of peace; that the wars were due in the main to reckless, bad white men always found on the frontier. So far as I am advised, there is not a charge that can be sustained against any regular officer or soldier of the Army, and be sustained against any regular officer of soldier of the Army, and where soldiers have had any agency whatever in them they have been volunteer soldiers, troops of the Territory under command of volunteer officers. This was beyond all doubt the case in the terrible and cruel massacre of Sand Creek. Chivington was the officer in command; he was an officer of the Territory, and, I have been informed, a professed minister of the Gospel, and I suspect an Indian preacher. But while the name of Chivington and infamy are forever inseparable, yet it brings no blot to the Army, for he was not one of them; but it is said that the Army is demoralizing in its influence and leaves in its train vices and immorality of the worst type and disease and in its train vices and immorality of the worst type, and disease and death in its most loathsome form. This I am prepared to admit to some extent is true, but then it cannot be worse, indeed not so bad, in its terrible effects upon the Indian as their poisonous contact with bad, dissolute, dissipated, and reckless white men unrestrained and without any law, who hang around these agencies under the present system. In 1867 General Pope reports, under what its friends call the Christian system, that one Indian out of every five has fastened upon him the fangs of a loathsome and deadly disease. But I

Again it is said with an air of triumph that officers do not teach school; neither do the agents, but the officers will protect schools; they will respect religion, encourage the missionary, open the door now shut to all the churches who in a spirit of Christian emulation will watch and work and stimulate each other in their efforts to promote the glory of their Master and the good of the Indian.

I would now call attention to the fact, of much importance in my view in the consideration of the question, that the Army is indispensable to the peace and quiet always of the wild Indians and often of those who have made advances in civilized life. In 1874 General Sheridan reports that he had eighteen thousand troops under his command, and all of them are scattered through the Indian Territory, near the reservations on the frontier, in the interest of protection and peace alike to the white and Indian. The whole number of troops will not exceed twenty-five thousand; and thus it will be seen you have nearly three-fourths of the Army already engaged in this work. You must feed them there and you must pay them there. Why not let them do all the Indian work while there, and get rid of the expense and often frauds of the agents and contracts? And then, again, the commissary and quartermaster of the Army, while feeding and clothing and providing for the wants of the Army, can do the same for the Indians. Their appointments to this army, can do the same for the Indians. Their appointments to this end are systematic and complete, as admitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Commissioner advises this change.

I call the attention of the committee to the report of the Commissioner on that subject. The Commissioner, as is known, is opposed to the transfer. He says:

There is, however, a sphere of service now undertaken by this Bureau which might, to its great relief, be transferred to the War Department. The supplies of clothing and subsistence required to be purchased for the Indian service amount to about $2.000,000. Much the larger portion of this sum is expended in purchasing for the Sioux and several other tribes a few articles in large amounts. The Indian Bureau has never had an adequate appointment for making such large purchases and for transportation of the articles to the distant parts of the country. The Quartermaster and Commissary Departments of the Army have such appointments in complete organization, through which the War Department would be able to purchase, inspect, and transport the goods and supplies required to subsist the Indians and fulfill the treaty obligations with much more regularity and system than is possible for this Bureau as at present organized.

That, sir, is the language of the present Commissioner on page 20 of his last report.

I will add to this, it can be done much cheaper and better. General Sherman and several other intelligent Army officers and civilians estimate that in this alone we can save several million dollars.

According to the reports of 1874 there are in all about 279,000 Indians. These Indians are classified by the Indian Commissioner in his report of 1874, and the first class in number, amounting to 98,108, are described as wild, untamed Indians, from whom you may expect hostilities and who require the presence of the military. There is then a second class, about 52,000, more advanced in civilization, and yet are designated as hostile, and they too require at some time the restraint of the Army. So with others that we might name. There will then be at least 150,000 of the Indians who will need the military to keep down war and promote peace and civilization. Let me ask then, again, why not turn the whole Indian question over to them? Why have a divided jurisdiction? Let the entire jurisdiction be lodged somewhere. You cannot do without the Army, and we can do without the agents, &c.

Again, sir, this demand for the Army increases. On page 29 of his report the present Commissioner says:

It should also be remembered that we might naturally have expected an increase instead of a diminution in disturbance and depredation on the part of the Indians, with a correspondingly increased cost for police and restraint by the Army, on account of the growing settlements which have pushed their way on every side, up to the border and sometimes into the very heart of the Indian country.

Now, sir, let us look for a moment at the expenses. To keep up this Indian Bureau and its agencies, two superintendents are required, at $4,000. There are sixty-nine agents, at $1,500 each; making $103,500. Then there is the Iowa agency, $500, and seven special agencies, $10,500; clerks, &c., $4,600; five inspectors, $15,000; traveling expenses of same, $7,500; Indian Burean, $69,830; other expenses, books, &c., $10,000; commissioners of the Indian board, $15,000; and they ask, in addition to that, for $5,000 more, which would be $20,000 a year. These items make in all a sum of $245,000. Then there is spent at each agency $6,000 a year, making $456,000. The total is thus $701,000.

It is not an unfair calculation to say that we can save at least onehalf of this sum by the bill introduced by the committee.

Thus, sir, we save money: We unite the jurisdiction and give one Department sole control. We preserve the peace, give as good if not better schools, have them better taught, promote law and order among the Indians as well as bad white men, and give them liberty of conscience and protect them in worshiping God according to the of conscience and protect them in worshiping God according to the dictates of conscience, under their own vine and fig. tree, while none dare molest or make them afraid. The policy of the Government will be peace and good-will to the Indians, and this policy will be carried out by the Army. They will obey orders, and if not carried out the home Government will be responsible, and not the Army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee for a moment to one other clause of the bill, that in relation to the President's salary. I had the honor, at the beginning of the session, to introduce a bill for a reduction of the President's salary. I know, sir, a proposition of this sort is regarded very unfavorably by some gentlemen. I know it has been called meanness. But, sir, I see that in the other end of the Capitol, if I may be allowed to allude to it, acthe other end of the Capitol, if I may be allowed to allude to it, action has been taken upon this very question. I feel curious to know how some gentlemen on the other side of this House may vote, gennow some gentlemen on the other side of this House may vote, gentlemen who may be more or less interested in the question. I warn them that already three candidates for the Presidency have voted for a reduction of the salary to $25,000. The Senate passed the bill by a considerable majority, and these gentlemen have the start of you, and will, unless you are more active, take all this wind out of your sails. Now, sir, I call the attention of the House and the country to the expenses and the emoluments of the presidential office. The President receives to day.

Salary Secretary, $3,500; assistant secretary, $2,500 Secretary detailed from the Army at his official wages Two executive clerks, $2,300 each, $4,600; steward, $2,006. Messenger, $1,200; furnace-keeper, $864 Two policemen, $2,640; one night watchman, $900. One night usher, $1,200; two doorkeepers, $1,200 each, $2,400. Contingent fund, including stationery. Official postage-stamps Annual repairs of President's Mansion Refurnishing same. Fuel for Executive Mansion and green-house Lights, fixtures, and gas Necessary repairs to the green-house and care of same.	6, 000 2, 500 6, 600 2, 064 3, 540 3, 600 6, 000 600 10, 000 10, 000 5, 000 5, 000
Interest on Executive Mansion annually	30,000
Reduce the salary	25, 000

And I desire to say right there that I have been under the impression-and I think other gentlemen have had the same impressionthat the President had only a private secretary and an assistant secretary. But, sir, he has more than that. We have spent $3,500 every year for a private secretary; for an assistant secretary, $2,500. And in addition to these the President has had detailed for his own use at the Executive Mansion General Babcock, at his official salary of $2,500. Up to the time of General Jackson there was no secretary, no clerk to the President. General Jackson had one clerk, who was merely to sign land patents. But now, with but little more to do, the President has three secretaries and two executive clerks.

But not only that, Mr. Chairman; he has received about the same for the last eight years, except the contingent fund. That in 1868 was $3,000, in 1873 it was made $4,000, and since that it has been $6,000. In estimating what the country pays the President we should estimate the house in which he lives. You give him the costlict furniture at a heavy expense, as I have shown. And you furnish him a house the annual interest on the cost of which at 10 per cent.

is over $30,000. Sum total, $150,904.

Cannot we reduce these expenses? Is it not right to reduce them?

Do not the people demand that it shall be done?

Now I want to show to the committee and to the country what it has cost the Government in the last few years to furnish and repair the President's House. The items are as follows:

And this is in addition to the old furniture sold. Again, sir, in 1866 there was a-

1	Denciency for repairs and furnishing of	$4,000
ı	Alterations in Executive Mansion	2,000
l	Repairs of green-house	500
	To complete the repairs for year ending June 30. 1867	6, 000
1	To complete the repairs and furnishing by act approved July 28, 1866	20,000
ı	In 1868 the annual repairs for President's house were	5, 000
۱	Flower-pots, glass, twine, &c	1,000
ļ	Additional repairs of conservatory and plants	5,000

Now, sir, that was under Mr. Johnson's administration. When he came in it was said that he found nothing in the Executive Mansion, and we spent about $116,000 in furnishing the house. After 1869, what was done? One would have thought that the house was repaired, that the furniture was ample, and all the arrangements were complete. But in 1869 there is spent-

For annual repairs Flower-pots, glass, and twine Refurnishing President's house	$10,000 1,000 25,000
In 1870 there is spent for—
Repairs and refurnishing President's house	15, 000 10, 000 1, 000 2, 500
In 1871 there is spent for—
Annual repairs	3, 904 84 1, 466 89
In 1872 there is spent for—
Repairs on Executive Mansion	10, 345
In 1873 there is spent for—
Annual repairs. Refurnishing the same and green-house.	15, 000 20, 000

Thus it will be seen that the whole cost since the year 1866 up to 1874 was $252,214.73, and since 1874 the expenses have been as in 1874, and calculation can easily be made as to the amount spent under General Grant's administration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand that my time is nearly out. I simply ask the House if, with all these appropriations and the completeness in furniture of the President's House, and the amount given him, he cannot live comfortably, luxuriously, on $25,000 a year? I believe he can. I have no doubt that he can. Gentlemen here who are anxious to occupy the position will not hesitate a moment to accept it, nor will their aspiration diminish if this reduction is made.

We will have candidates enough and as good Presidents.

Mr. YEATES. Mr. Chairman, it is with some reluctance that I attempt to address the committee this morning, being quite unwell; but I feel that I would do injustice to myself and to the people I represent if I were to sit longer in this House without raising my voice in behalf of that noble constituency that sent me here. I know, sir, that many gentlemen who occupy a place like that which I occupy have been considerably intimidated during this session by the taunts and threats that have been hurled from the other side of the House. We have seen bold leaders marching down the aisles with their fists clenched and shaking them toward this side of the House and de-nouncing us as rebels; and the distinguished gentleman from Massa-chusetts [Mr. Hoar] has read us a lecture, in which he says that he is tired of hearing men on this side of the House, who so recently have gotten here, giving him their advice.

Mr. Chairman, I stand here by the grace of the American people. I stand here to-day by the free choice of the people of my district to represent that district and my State in this Congress. I am not accustomed to hear men speak of myself and other gentlemen as rebels.

Sir, these republican leaders have been so accustomed to tyrannize over men, that they think now they can rule the country as they please; and I am not at all astonished when I see them making such Herculean efforts to hold the place and power they have held so long.

It may be thought by gentlemen that I am a red-hot rebel, and that I am standing here to lecture them. That is exactly what I want them to understand I am not doing. The people that I represent are as loyal to the Government as the people of Massachusetts, New York, New Hampshire, or any other State in the Union. My people, from the earliest settlement of our country, have been fired with the spirit of liberty and freedom, and in all contests and everywhere have never surrendered that principle. Why do gentlemen, after saying that they have pardoned the people of the South and invited us to seats on this floor, undertake repeatedly to wave the hand of tyranny over us and declare that we ought not to speak and vote according to the dictates of our conscience?

I rise to-day, Mr. Chairman, to criticise the character and acts of the republican party since the war. I march to the task, sir, boldly, and when I do it, sir, I want to discriminate between national honor and republican honor. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have for a long time assumed that disloyalty to the republican party is disloyalty to this Government, and they have held the rod over our friends here who come from the North until they have shaken the confidence of some of them; but I tell you, sir, that disloyalty to the republican party is not disloyalty to the Government. I claim, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to be as patriotic a man as there is in this House. I came here with no other purpose but that of serving the country honestly and faithfully. I am not a very hot partisan, but I am determined to maintain the principles I hold according to the best of my ability.

I want to draw a comparison and show to my friends around me that the cry of gentlemen on that side of the House in regard to rebels is not honest, but hypocritical. When you hear them talk sometimes, you would think their idea was that a man who had been in the army of the Confederate States was not fit to occupy a place on this floor or to hold any office of profit or honor under the Government. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,] when we had under him interrupt me. I hope I will be pardoned for entering a little into discussion the amnesty bill, undertook to produce here a letter which he said he had received from a distinguished gentleman from North Carolina. I want the country to know who are his associates in the South. He had read here a letter of Governor Holden, of North Carolina, his political ally, his warm friend, his supporter perhaps for his ambitious views and schemes, and he held that letter up here as a letter from a model patriot, who was crying out for his own liberty and his own rights. Sir, Governor Holden for twenty-odd years was the leading secessionist in North Carolina, the head and front of the rebellion—a member, gentlemen, of the secession convention; and he signed the ordinance of secession with a new gold pen, and then waved it three times around his head and said it should be placed away among the valuable archives of the family, and that no mortal man should ever write with it again. This is the friend of the dis-tinguished member; this is the man he wants to make out is better than the men on this side of the House. But that is not all.

I could go through the Southern States and select leading secessionists of the country whom the republican party has hugged to its bosom long ago. There is one distinguished hero and leader, General Longstreet, whose fiery columns were felt on every battle-field but a few years ago, and whose name was worth a thousand men to the cause of secession. Where is he to-day, and where has he been for the last eight years? He is on that side, and they think h m a marvelously proper and good patriot. I will tell you a secret. The republican party undertook to buy up the men of the South with office and money. Those who sold themselves they thought to be patriots, and those who did not they de-nounced as rebels. That is what you have done. Therefore, gentle-men, I feel free to speak here in this House; for people have sent me here as they sent you, to represent them as a free and independent man. Let the country understand that. Do not let it be said or thought that because there are a great many southern democrats here this is, therefore, an ex-confederate House of Representatives. They are undertaking to weigh down the democratic party of the North by saying this is an ex-confederate Congress that has met here. North by saying this is an ex-confederate Congress that has met here. Why, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, they carried me up on a high mountain, showed me the glories and beauties of the republican party, and said: "All this will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." And I said to them: "Get thee hence, Satan; it is written thou shalt not live by office alone." [Great laughter:] And not only my humble self; there is not a southern democrat here but has heard the same siren voice and beautiful song. They kept us out in the cold; they would not pardon us; they tried to starve us into submission to their party, and now they raise the howl that we are rebels, because they cannot buy us. Gentlemen, you have got Holden and Longstreet, and a thousand more, whom you bought up and put in your pocket, and whom you now consider marvelously proper and paticitie men. This country will judge of such things. Let me tell you, gentlemen here, who represent the North, that there are Union soldiers tlemen here, who represent the North, that there are Union soldiers on this side of the House.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. YEATES. No. There is on this side of the House my distinguished friend from Ohio, [General Banning,] who was on the Union side, and my distinguished friend from Ohio, [General Rice,] who by his modesty of demeanor always commands my respect, who spilled his blood for the Stars and Stripes that are waving over your head, Mr. Chairman; and yet I say to you that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] think more to-day of Bill Holden and Longstreet than they do of General Rice, General Williams, General Banning, and the other noble democrats here who fought and bled for their country. It is noble democrats here who fought and bled for their country. It is all party hypocrisy and humbug, that they expect to cry aloud this summer to carry the election. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I expect to speak boldly and freely, and to keep within the bounds of patriotism, too. [Renewed laughter.] That is what I expect to do. I have been thinking over these things for several days past, I confess. I have seen gentlemen on that side of the House, merely for political effect, waving their hands toward us and denouncing us as unpatriotic and not true to the country, especially the gentleman who rose up a little while ago to interrupt me, [Mr. White,] calling us rebels. I have looked about me here and seen those good men who fought in that contest and came home victorious and offered us the hand of reconciliation and peace. Though I despise the contemptible manner in which we have been treated I despise the contemptible manner in which we have been treated and insulted here, thank God I can say to-day that I love the Government of the United States, and shall stand by it as long as I live.

Mr. FOSTER. Good!

Mr. YEATES. You cannot drive me ever again to go against this Gov-

Mr. YEATES. You cannot drive me ever again to go against this Government. You may try to place my section of the country in the position that Great Britain has placed Ireland, and get up a contest and war of feeling between us everywhere, but we will not be a party to such a strife. [Applause.] We intend to stand up here for the rights of the Government. It will be the last lesson as well as the first that we will teach our boys around us, to stand by the old flag and by the principles of the democratic party. [Great applause and laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. A question now?

Mr. YEATES. No; you have had four weeks already. [Laughter.] Ido not say that I would not yield to some gentlemen from

I do not want to take up much of the limited time of the detail. committee when there are so many others here who wish to address the committee. But I propose to look a little around us and see what we have had; what this great republican party has done for us

I will tell you one thing it has done. It has undertaken to bribe the people. It has demoralized the people. It has made an attack upon the virtue of the people. It has broken down the purity of the ballot-box. It has destroyed the freedom of voting in my section of my country, if not in yours. It has raised the standard of the military and placed it. Mr. Chairman even in your own city in terrare your the and placed it, Mr. Chairman, even in your own city, in terror over the ballot-box, a thing entirely inconsistent with liberty. I do not say the republican party has not done some good things. There are men in the republican party whom I like, who, I think, are patriotic in their motives. But their party is now being driven to the wall, and is fighting, with a tenacity with which it never fought before, to retain position and place.

You see, sir, they did not expect when we were turned loose that this House would so soon be democratic. [Laughter.] It frightened them; they were amazed at it; and they have undertaken, as I said before, to lay the burden of secession upon the northern democrats, weighing them down with us, so that they may beat the democratic party in the coming contest.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that the republican party had done great harm in the South. I am prepared to prove that. Our colored friends once looked upon the republican party as being their saviour. They are learning better. Now, Mr. Chairman, to be perfectly serious, we all know that the republican party did not start out in the war with the aim of freeing the colored people. It declared in its resolutions in Congress and in the proclamations of its President that that was not the object. But, sir, the colored man was freed, in spite of both the northern and southern men, by the will of God. And the colored people are learning that.

Another thing: The republican party did not willingly give the colored man his right to vote.

A MEMBER. Who did?

Mr. YEATES. I will answer that question. They undertook to pass the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United pass the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and said to the southern people, "Vote for that; you are fresh out of the war; now turn around and abuse and curse your friends, and let them die." We would not do that. If the republicans could have got the white people of the South to have voted with them they would have let the colored man go on forever without a vote. But when they found out that the southern people, though defeated in arms, still rose pure and strong in virtue and could not be beaten down in that way, they threatened us that they would let the colored people vote. Is not that the history of the times?

So, in due course of time, when they could not get our votes, then they turned the colored people loose and let them vote. What else did they do? They multiplied offices, and filled those offices with ten thousand carpet-baggers who came down and prejudiced the colored people against us. As Mr. Bruce, the colored Senator from Mississippi is reported to have said the other day in the Senate, they poisoned the minds of the colored people; they left the country a howling waste and wilderness; they destroyed liberty in Louisiana and South Carolina, and in all the States where they had the power

But, gentlemen, you are vastly mistaken if you think that the colored people are going to hold to you forever. You have held them for a while; but you have not the power or influence to bear upon the colored men to keep them your servants, for they will vote as they please in the coming election. That may sound a little unpleasant to my friends on the other side who have been trying to teach the colored men that they were their lord and saviour. I admit that colored men that they were their lord and saviour. I admit that the time has been when some of the colored people would bow down to that party; but they will not bow down much longer. That is

Mr. Chairman, I have not time as my friend from Georgia did the other day to go into details and show the utter rottenness of the revenue system that exists in the South. I say that those officers were placed there not only as spies upon us but to rob the people. And they did rob us. Why, sir, I represent a poor people. If I had the heart to tell you of the feelings of our people a few years ago and of our poverty—if I had the siren voice and sweet tongue of my friend over the way, perhaps I might melt you to tears. When our "boys" over the way, perhaps I might melt you to tears. When our "boys" came home, bruised and wounded, the land was grown up with weeds and briars. But they went to work; they worked like men. The good Lord blessed us with most abundant crops. What was the result? These myriads of office-holders came along through the country; they took our cotton and our tobacco. They taxed us upon stamps; they taxed our land; they taxed us upon everything. They threatened us and arrested us and carried us before the Federal courts. Why, gentlemen, I tell you there was a perfect "reign of terror;" and they left our country desolate.

All the time they were trying to force us to be republicans. Talk about your patriotism! Your patriotism oozes out of the tingers of your republicanism. You love your party better than your country. That is not all. Your party corrupted the colored people, and corrupted the white people. Our land has been robbed and plundered. Stealing has been the order of the day. And the stealings have been been that the thick conital. I do not know where the provider work of the conital ways and the provider to this conital. brought to this capital. I do not know where the spoils were divided, nor who shared them. That is a republican mystery. But one thing is certain: the streams of money that have been running from the South since the war have been coming to Washington by one means or another, and very few democratic barks have floated on those corrupt currents. Why, sir, if that good man, Abraham Lincoln—and I do not offend my own poople when I say that I always did believe him to be a good man, and I believe it to-day—had lived, and when he was stricken down it was a sad blow to the South—if Lincoln had lived, there would have been a different state of things to-day. But, Mr. Chairman, in the excitement of the hour following his death the republicans in the North set themselves to work to grind our people to the earth because we would not submit to their behests. Mr. Chairman, do not you and everybody else know that men having the blood running through their veins that we have can-not be made to succumb to force? We must contend for that which we believe is right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these people have not the same excuse that Now, Mr. Chairman, these people have not the same excuse that Pat had when he stole the pig. All the money they have taken from us is gone. Somebody was talking about paying us back the cotton tax; and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] rises up and predicts that this democratic House is going to tax the country millions instead of economizing. It is true that the Supreme Court has said that $60,000,000 was taken from our people illegally and without right. But, sir, it is gone now and we cannot get it back. I say they have not the same excuse that Pat had, for when Pat stole Mr. Malonav's nig and was asked by the priest what he would do on the dor nave not the same excuse that Pat had, for when Pat stole Mr. Maloney's pig and was asked by the priest what he would do on the day of judgment: "Does your honor say that Mr. Maloney would be there and his pig would be there?" "Yes," said the priest; "and what will you do then?" "Why, I would say, 'Mr. Maloney, here is your pig." [Laughter.] They cannot say that. They have stolen the pig from us, taken him away and devoured him long since; but, sir, by the magnanimity and generosity of the Government of the United States we have come here to represent our country, and are going to represent it faithfully and honestly. I am prepared to vote for any measure which may be started on that side of the House or on this side which looks to the welfare and prosperity of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I have not time to review the whole history of the republican party since the war. I may do that some time during the summer, but not here now on this floor. I will, however, say on the authority of a gentleman recently elected Senator from Kentucky, that the republican party in five years of Grant's administration has spent more money than was spent from the time George Washington was sworn into office down to the time James Buchanan left it. In five years of profound peace, with the exception of the Modoc Indian war, the republican party spent more than was spent by the Government from the time George Washington was inaugurated down to the time James Buchanan went out of office! Although we had spread the area of our territory; although we had crossed the Alleghany Mountains; although we had stretched out beyond Kentucky, Illinois, and Indiana; although we had driven back the Indians with terrific slaughter and at great cost; although we had purchased Missouri and Louisiana and Florida, and paid for them; although we had conquered Mexico and acquired territory by the treaty of peace; although the great tide of white emigration had poured over the Rocky Mountains and settled down into the valley of the Sacramento and all along the Pacific slope; although we had won New Mexico and Texas, and at New Orleans had whipped the British once more; although we had done all this, and paid for it, yet there was less money spent in all that time, down to the going out of office of James Buchanan, than was spent by Grant's republican administration in five years. What has become of all this money? Where has it all gone? One thing is very clear, that we have none of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the question before the House, and that is this bill of retrenchment, economy, and reform. Right here I propose to look at the acts of the republican party since we have been propose to look at the acts of the republican party since we have been here during this session. I say that they have undertaken to throttle every investigation we have attempted, and I want the country to hear the reason for it. You were here ten years, and what did you expose? You of the republican party were here for ten long years, and by a large majority, as was said by some one a little while ago. What did you do in the way of exposing fraud? What did you expose? Where were your committees of investigation? You say now we are going to work to carry these investigations on in a spirit of partisanship. If that be so, why did you not do it before, so that we could not indulge in any such partisanship? Why did you not expose the Belknap frauds? Some gentlemen on committees from that side have got quite industrious in hunting up private people, looking after private citizens, and in this way trying to keep the office-holders out of sight. When investigations are going after the office-holders, they vate citizens, and in this way trying to keep the office-holders out of sight. When investigations are going after the office-holders, they have not been known to work very hard. [Laughter.] Why not go after the office-holders, and not after private citizens who are not holding office, but perhaps would like to? [Laughter.] By so doing perhaps you think you will throttle investigation; but you are very much mistaken. We are going to stay here and pursue these investigations, to fight it out on that line if it takes all summer. [Laughter.] I remember, if I am not mistaken, Mr. Chairman, not very long ago, during the last Congress, a witness was brought up here who would not answer questions. What did you do with him? You put him in jail and kept him there until he did answer. This House has brought up a witness who refuses to answer, because it is likely, if he should do so, it will make some one sick. [Laughter.] You now talk of the despotism of the House of Representatives and the outrage committed upon a free American citizen. We are in favor of exposing fraud and corruption, and the people will see the matter in its proper light; and what you are doing here your papers are doing, making the same

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but when we undertook from the Judiciary Committee to bring in a bill to strike at a crying evil and a shame in regard to elections—when we undertook to make provision for a defect in the law as it stands in that regard, the gentleman on the other side jumped up and said so far as these frauds were conon the other side jumped up and said so far as these frauds were concerned they were only in reference to Congressmen. If that were so, as the gentleman from Maine said, why did he not provide the remedy before? Why did not the distinguished gentleman from Maine, if he was sincere in that declaration, last year and the year before that bring in his bill to do away with this shame and outrage? I say one thing, Mr. Chairman, that that gentleman very nearly overrant this side of the House yesterday. [Laughter ] He not only leads that this side of the House yesterday. [Laughter.] He not only leads that side of the House, but he undertook to come over here and lead us; and came very nearly doing it. [Laughter.] I was ashamed of it, I confess, when I knew that for years he and his party had been in power and had not undertaken to make this reform.

I wish to state now distinctly that I do not know how it is in your country, but my friend from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] will agree with me that we can hardly get an election down in our country without the interference of office-holders. It was that evil the Judiciary Committee wished to correct.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, in Washington City, where these poor women and poor boys are working for their mothers and their little brothers and sisters, when an election comes round, the Interior De-partment and the Treasury Department send out their orders and levy a tax upon the head of every one of them; and pay they must. And the aggregate amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars as a corruption fund with which the republican party may carry the elec-tions and beat down the free will of the people. That is the reason why they fought it as soon as we struck at it.

A MEMBER. And they must go home and canvass their neighbor-

Mr. YEATES. Yes, sir; I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. They must go home and canvass their neighborhoods. They got leave of absence for ten or fifteen days to go home to New Hampshire the other day, and every fellow that refused to go was spotted. That is what we are driving at, to keep the men who are high in place from grinding down the poor laborers and others who are in the Government offices in Washington City and in the navy-yards throughout

But is not the patrotism of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] magnificent? He wishes to go for the Congressmen. He says they are the most corrupt of all. How does he know that they are corrupt? Why does he not state it? Why does he not talk it right out? Ah! geutlemen of the committee, we are trying to break down this abuse, and I tell you we ought to have fought it on that principle and stood by it. But we have got it all now Congressmen. down this abuse, and I tell you we ought to have fought it on that principle and stood by it. But we have got it all now, Congressmen and Senators and everybody else, and we will see who will last the longest at it. We have not got any money ourselves. [Laughter.] We are trying to live right, down in poor old North Carolina, Virginia, and Georgia. We are working hard, and the people have sent us here for a purpose. We have not had any chances of this kind down there and we do not want them either. But we want the free expression of the people at the ballot-box.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I am the first democrat that has stood on this floor since the war from my district. And why? Simply because the free expression of opinion has never been obtained or permitted in my district before 1874. That is the reason. Why, sir, the colored people have been threatened, and have been told that if we were people have been threatened, and have been told that if we were elected we would put them back into slavery, and they actually told me, "Mr. YEATES, if you are elected and do not carry us back into slavery we will go for you ever after." [Laughter.]

We are going to give them more liberty than they ever had before. I have seen a colored man myself go to the ballot-box five times pale and trembling to vote for your humble servant and turned away every time afraid to do it. And he never got his vote in uptil a steer-cart ran away and drew off the crowd, and he then slipped it in. [Laughter.] I was glad the steer-cart did run away because it gave me onter.] I was glad the steer-cart did run away, because it gave me another vote.

You talk about intimidation. I have seen white folks in our country afraid to vote because they were under some Government officer. But I tell you they need not be afraid; there is a voice rising from that country that is going to speak in patriotic tones as loud as any thunder. We are increasing. We have got a broad territory in North Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, and Alabama. We do love our country. It is as fair a country as God ever gave to man. I love our country is eas-beach and watch the rolling in of the tide that tells me that this is the land that God gave to my fathers. I have stood, sir, among its blue mountains of the West and drank in the pure air that among its blue mountains of the west and drain in the pure are made God so freely gave us. I have hung over our dark, sluggish streams and dreamed of the stories of heroic deeds of the past. I have prayed, Mr. Chairman, that God would send a tide of population into our country that would wake us up, that would make us thoroughly industrious, that would bring commerce and wealth and position to our country. And it is coming. The men of the North are coming in there constantly; and if they come republicans, it is not long be in there constantly; and if they come republicans, it is not long before they vote the democrat ticket.

The gentleman over there from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who speaks sometimes so facetionsly, has a friend in my town who wanted me to make that gentleman's acquaintance, but the gentleman has looked so ferocious that I hardly dared to do it. His friend in my district is a mighty clever man. He was a republican for some time, but now he votes the democratic ticket regularly.

I tell you, sir, that we have a territory that if filled up will bring a volume of strength to the democrats. I beg you gentlemen not to be scared, do not be uneasy, do not be frightened. We are going to help you to preserve the Government and bring it back to its former purity, when it was a joy and glory to us, and now we want to get some of the joy.

There have been speeches made here, Mr. Chairman, intended for Buncombe; but this is intended for the good of the country. [Great laughter.] Entirely for the good of the country. It is to hold up and sustain the weak and drooping hands of our friends in the North, and let them know that we are not going to be the heavy load upon them which the republicans are not going to be the neavy load upon them which the republicans are trying to represent us to be. Al! gentlemen, just tell your people, of the friends of the republicans, Longstreet and Holden, they are very fond of them and would have been fond of me, too, if I had joined them. But why am I called a rebel! Because I belong to the democratic party. That is the idea; that is the distinction which you make. They would be fond enough of us if they could only get us over. Did not they send for a good solel from North Caralica, Indea Sattle and make him minister to rebel from North Carolina, Judge Settle, and make him minister to Peru! Why, he has killed some of your folks; certainly he has; slaughtered them on the battle-field, yet when, he came and joined the republican church and was baptized into the republican faith he was a very proper man. That is all there is in it.

Gentlemen of the democratic party of the North, the hope of the South is in you; I say it in all solemnity. [Langhter on the republican side of the House.] You gentlemen on the opposite side might have given us hope if you had possessed patriotism enough to have done it, but it was not in you; you were sectional, and when you could not beat us down you threatened us with the colored vote, and you have got it for a short time, but it will soon leave you. The reason why I say that the hope of the South is in the democratic party and the patriotic men of the country, is because they are the only people in the North who ever held out the hand of friendship to us; who have ever undertaken to bring us back into the Union and make us good citizens; but you gentlemen on the opposite side have made us by your persecutions dislike you more than you have accused us of disliking the Union. Now you understand what I mean.

Mr. WHITE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?
Mr. YEATES. No, sir; no, sir! I have got the floor and I do not yield it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from North Carolina will

Mr. YEATES. I started out to say to my democratic friends that our hope is in you and the hope of freedom and civil liberty everywhere.

I say this, Mr. Chairman, that as an individual, (I do not speak for a party,) but as an individual living down in the swamps of North Carolina, when I saw Grantism becoming so powerful in the country I saw something about to take place worse than secession, and that was to change the character of the Government. I tell you that there is hardly a man in the South belonging to the republican party who would not have made Grant king or anything else he asked for; and the country is indebted to the liberal republicans in the North for coming out and denouncing him and his administration and helping to drive that administration from power. Gentlemen, we must do these people justice. I say now that I feel that, if it had not been for the Government-loving people of the republican party, who came out and denounced these frauds and corruption, such a change might have and denotinced these trades and correption, such a change might have been attempted. Massachusetts, or a portion of it—I see before me a distinguished exception—would have gone and put a crown on him as Mark Antony undertook to put it upon Cæsar.

I say, gentlemen, the principles of the democratic party are right, and this Government, in my opinion, cannot be successfully managed and this Government, in my opinion, cannot be successfully managed outside of the principles of the democratic party: economy, retrenchment, and reform. Yes, sir, we are bound to have these principles.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with great pleasure to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the other day. It was one of the best speeches, I think, I have heard in this House. He spoke my sentiments; and, though I do not know whether I shall support every item in the bill or not, for I have not examined them with care, I am in favor of the principles of the bill, and I think it does great credit to the heart and partiotism of the distinguished chairman and credit to the heart and patriotism of the distinguished chairman and the distinguished committee that reported it. Why, gentlemen, what has brought about all this corruption in the land? It is the thirst for office. What created this thirst for office? The high salaries allowed. What was the object of that? The republican party multipled offices to buy up and corrupt the people and attach them to their party. The time has come to put a stop to that. I tell you, sir, that the plowman out in his field has heard the whistling notes of money at this capital and has stopped and turned to see if he could not procure an office. The workman has done it. It has been the case everywhere, and you see here a perfect stream of men from the beginning to the end of the session, coming from all parts of the country, from its fields and its workshops, to Washington, to see if they cannot get

What will become of the industries of the land? I believe that officers of the Government ought not to receive any more money than they absolutely need to stay and serve the Government in their

Now, Mr. Chairman, when first I heard that the committee were Now, Mr. Chairman, when arst I neard that the committee were going to reduce these salaries it hurt my feelings, [laughter;] it certainly did. I reckon, speaking boastfully, that I am about as poor a member as there is here and I need my salary as much as any man, and it certainly did hurt me. But I began to think over it and what was the object of it, and I said to myself "Cannot I give up such portion of my salary as an enlightened Congress may see fit to take away for the purpose of preserving the Treasury of the country and increasing the love for work, labor, and industry?" It is my duty to do it although I may need every cent. I will do it and stay here if the people send me back. It becomes every member here to do it and not to set to work to abuse the committee and run down the efforts of the patriotic committee to reduce the expenses of the Government and save the millions to the people that every week and month and year are taken from them. That is what we want.

I tell you, gentlemen, that if $50,000 salary is left in the hands of the President of the United States with all the other advantages that he has of place and pomp and circumstance, instead of there being one or two men from Maine and one or two from Massachusetts and one or two men from Maine and one or two from Massachusetts and other States seeking for the position, there will be about a thousand from each State who will want it. The scramble for office will become so corrupting and baneful in this country that this Government cannot continue in its present form. Simplicity is a principle of republican government, and no republican form of government can stand long against the tide of corruption there is in this land. It may do for one man who holds the arm of power and can command the people to bow down before him and yield obedience. But I tell you that a government that must be built upon the virtue of the people cannot exist as a republican government when that virtue is poisoned at the fountain-head, when the people are led astray by the love and thirst for

Gentlemen, we must go back to the practices and principles of our fathers, when George Washington was so patriotic as not only to refuse the crown that was offered him, but to refuse to take pay for a Jefferson, of Madison, and of the Adamses, who gave so much character and beauty to the patriotic history of Massachusetts. Let us go back to those times. The war is ended; we want peace. God is ready to smile upon this land, to banish all our troubles and dissensions, to remove the poverty of the people, if we will but return to the paths of virtue. The fountain of public virtue has become corrupted; private character has been attacked. There never has been a country that so suffered from political and social sores as this country is suffering

Now what shall we do? Shall we stand by our Committee on Appropriations, or shall we let a selfish purpose to get and hoard money deter us from doing our duty? I appeal to you on this side especially; you were sent here in the interest of economy and reform, and the people will hold you responsible for your acts here. You owe it to your-selves, to your constituents; you owe it to future generations to lift the warning voice now against this tide of oppression and corruption the warning voice now against this tide of oppression and corruption that is going over the land.

Mr. Chairman, I was going on to say that we are going to have a big fight in this country this year, but I hope it will not be a very harmful one, and I hope we will have a good time of peace after the fight is over. The armies of the contending parties are marshaling for the fray. I believe they say our pickets were driven in the other day in New Hampshire. That was only a little skirmish, however. The banners of our party are floating now in the breeze; our men are getting ready from Maine to California. We are going to plant our standard right in the White House; that is where we are going, gentlemen. Hanghter, I and do not get mad and say we are rebels and tlemen, [laughter,] and do not get mad and say we are rebels and secessionists. [Renewed laughter.] We are going there, and when we get there we will clean out the Augean stable; we certainly will. We intend to reform this Government if the people will stand by the party that is trying to do right.

When I said, some minutes ago, that our hopes in the South are in the democratic party, some of my friends on the other side laughed. It is not the first time that I have heard folks laugh. What produces laughter? It is produced in various ways. There are some over there who often try to raise a laugh by getting off something that the reporters cannot take down—"Ah," "H-m;" "O! my," and so on. [Laughter.]

I meant what I said, and if those gentlemen had lived in my country they would mean it too. If they had seen their industries broken down, their money taken from them, their prison-houses filled, and the tide of corruption that is flowing down there from that party, they would say that their hopes were in the noble democratic party, which will provide for them a pure administration of the Govern-

I tell you, gentlemen, when in 1874 I began to hear the news I felt very much as the immortal Mr. Slote said last night, "G. H."—Glory Hallelujah! [Great laughter.] I certainly did. When the first Hallelujah! [Great laughter.] I certainly did. When the first sweet notes came from Massachusetts and told me that the tidal wave had struck that coast and was sending to Congress a set of men who loved their country more than party—well, I can hardly tell how I did feel. [Laughter.] I said to myself, There is hope in the old country yet. I thought the time was coming when this Government would not stand longer in awe of one man. And when that tidal wave began to roll on throughout the land from the East to the West, from the northern lakes away down to Florida, I felt double "G. H."

I felt very much as one does when he stands on some high prominent place looking for the first coming of the sun. Did you ever do it? It is a most beautiful sight. Come with me down to our own mountain country, and go up on some lofty peak and look for the coming of the glorious sun. You know it is coming, for you see the first gray streak across the heavens, which tells you that the god of day is about to appear from behind the distant hills. Presently he comes with his full power, with his melting, life-giving, and beautiful rays. He lights up all the hills; the insects are humming, the birds are warbling; the farmer is singing at his work, and all nature is animated and beautiful. Darkness has fled away; the great shadows of night have crept behind the western hills.

And so I think it is now. The sun of democracy is rising; its first rays can be seen and felt even here. It has been behind the clouds, but it is coming out, and just so surely as it comes out shining with its full effulgent light this darkness and corruption will skulk away and hide itself in the ground. That is what will become of some of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I thank you and my friends for the courteous attention you have given me. I am sorry to have troubled you so long.

Mr. THROCKMORTON addressed the committee. Before the conclusion of his speech,

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

THROCKMORTON] has expired by reason of the expiration of the time allowed by the House for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] object to the gentleman from Texas having sufficient time to conclude his remarks?

Mr. HURLBUT. Let it be understood that when the bill comes up again one hour shall be given to this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that the time has been nearly equally divided on this bill between gentlemen on both sides, according to the list which is on the Speaker's desk.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think there has been any unfair distribution of the time. If the House will consent to do away with prints bill beginner.

Mr. HURLBUT. The understanding is, then, that you will give another hour for general debate when the bill comes up again #

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I would like to have it understood as

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me to call his attention to the fact that it requires unanimous consent for the gentleman from Texas to proceed; and that the unanimous consent necessary for waiving the consideration of private bills to-morrow may be had at the same time by one arrangement.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree to that suggestion.
Mr. HOAR. It may be necessary for the committee to rise for a moment to get that consent. It cannot be done in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the legislative,

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the general debate on this bill be extended for one hour to-morrow after the morning hour, in addition to the time which the gentleman from Texas may occupy this evening. Mr. RANDALL. I think the House can make it to-night.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, by unanimous consent.

RELIEF OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in response to resolution of the House of February 3, a report of Lieuten ant-Colonel Merritt, of the Ninth Cavalry, charged by the Secretary of War with the duty of making inquiries into the cause of the exhaustion of the appropriation for the support and subsistence of the Sioux Indians for the present fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that the gentleman from Texas may finish his speech. We came out of committee with the understanding we would go back to allow the gentleman to conclude his speech.

Mr. BOONE. There was a special order for to-day, the bill providing for the sale of the Pawnee Indian reservation; but instead of taking up that special order the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the appropriation bill. I desire now to call up that special order.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists on taking the sense of the House on that subject, he can do so by moving an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOONE. I will do that, unless gentlemen will consent to postpone the consideration of that special order to a future day.

The question was taken on Mr. Randall's motion, and it was

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THROCKMORTON resumed the floor and concluded his speech. The speech in full is as follows:

TRANSFER OF THE INDIAN BUREAU TO THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, I propose to address the committee on a practical question, and one of as much importance to the country as any before us for consideration.

The subject of our Indian relations demands the earnest and most serious attention of Congress. The magnitude of the expenditures and the preservation of the lives and property of the people living along the rapidly extending settlements of the frontier, require at our hands the closest scrutiny and the most thoughtful consideration. The border settlements are constantly menaced and depredated upon by a treacherous people, who respect treaty obligations only when it suits their convenience. A people who are reared in the belief that their future existence in the hunting-grounds of the Great Spirit will be made happy in proportion to the number of thefts and murders committed by them on earth.

How to discharge the moral as well as treaty obligations of a great and powerful nation to these untutored children of the soil; how to foster and encourage the spirit of peace with those so inclined; how to restrain and punish the vicious; how to protect them from the consequences of contact with the unprincipled and rapacious adventurers of our own race, and, while doing all this, to keep a watchful eye on the expenditures of the Indian Department, and to limit its appropriations to the lowest point consistent with the sacred obligations of the Government, is the difficult problem now presenting itself to us for solution.

Prior to 1849, the management of Indian affairs was under the control of the War Department. Heavy expenditures were then in-curred, and the last appropriation for Indian purposes, made before the transfer of the management to the Interior Department, amounted to something over $900,000. Since that period many new obligation: have been incurred by the Government, toward the Indians of the new western States and Territories, but it is not believed that the additional tribes provided for, and consequent obligations incurred, justify the large increase in the expenditures; for while new obligations were assumed, old ones have been canceled, and others have been greatly The appropriations for Indians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860, as nearly as I have been able to ascertain the amount, was about $1,790,000. So that we see the increase in the eleven years following the transfer from the War to the Interior Department runs up from a fraction over $900,000 to $1,790,000, which cannot be regarded as a very extraordinary increase. By reference to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, made to this Congress, it will be seen that the appropriations for Indian purposes, beginning with the fiscal year of 1870 and ending with the fiscal year of 1876, amounted to $43,608,332; there being also a deficiency of $495,000 for 1874, and a supposed deficiency of $200,000 for this year, yet to be provided, making a total of $44,303,332, or an average of annual appropriations of $6,329,047.

In this connection it may not be wrinteresting a proceedable. up from a fraction over $900,000 to $1,790,000, which cannot be re-

In this connection, it may not be uninteresting or unprofitable to look back and see the expenditures of the Government for all purposes at different periods of our national existence, and compare these with the immense expenditures of more recent years, and their enormous increase for Indian purposes. If the time would permit, such comparison would prove not only curious and interesting, but profitable. The last three years of General Washington's first term, with a population, in 1790, of 3,929,214, amounted to $19,240,334. In 1822 the total expenditures of the Government, with a population of about 10,000,000, were $17,676,592. In 1823 the expenditures were $15,314,171.

These total expenditures included every item of appropriation—the revolutionary debt, pensions, the entire civil list, the War, Navy, and Indians. Deducting the revolutionary debt and pensions, according to Mr. Benton, the other expenditures for the years mentioned amounted to about $8,000,000, being only $1,661,000 more than the average appropriation for Indians alone for the last seven years.

By reference to the recent of Treasurer New it will be seen that the

By reference to the report of Treasurer New it will be seen that the total expenditures for the year 1875, including interest on the public debt, civil and miscellaneous, War, Navy, and Interior Departments, amount to $274,623,392. Deducting interest on public debt, the sum of total expenditures is $171,529,848.70. Rating our present population at 40,000,000, including Indians, this would give as the cost of government of all ages, classes, and colors, Indians included, at $4.28 per capita. By a further reference to the report of the Commissioner per capita. By a further reference to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs it will be seen that our total present Indian population, exclusive of Alaska, is 279,337, which I believe to be very considerably beyond the real number. Now, take the average appropriation of the last seven years, of $6,329,047, and you will find the cost of the government of these Indians to be about $23.05 per capita.

It should not be forgotten that many of the Indians included in this enumeration receive nothing from the Government, and others but a very trifling amount, thus showing that the real amount per capita would be greatly increased to such as are the peculiar recipiants of the very triling amount, thus showing that the real amount per capita would be greatly increased to such as are the peculiar recipients of the bounty of the Government. So that to provide for carrying on the government of a great people, inhabiting a vast extent of country, bounded by two oceans and extending on its northern border through fifty-eight degrees of longitude, and through twenty-four degrees of latitude, including all its expenditures of every kind, save interest on the public debt, is five times less per capita for our own people than the cost of taking care of the Indians.

It is worthy of serious reflection that the cost of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government, its Army legislative, and judicial departments of the Government, its Army and Navy, its consular and diplomatic service, the protection and maintenance of its commerce, its pension list, its harbor and river improvements, and railway obligations, with the administration of its laws, all, are five times less in proportion than the expenditures incurred in taking care of a few thousand treacherous and blood-thirsty savages, and peddling out to them civilization and religion in small but choice quantities.

It is not denied that there has been an express and recepits for the same property of the same pro

It is not denied that there has been an excuse and necessity for an increase in the expenditures of the Indian affairs of the Government, but it is seriously controverted that the amount of such increase is either justifiable or defensible. The treaties made, and the obligations assumed by the Government with the Indians in the earlier days of its existence, and indeed up to 1860, were prudent and economical. No obligation was assumed or liability incurred that was not instificially sixtuated that there has been an expense and indeed up to 1860. Since then there has been an extravagance in treaty stipjustifiable. Since then there has been an extravagance in treaty stipulations neither commendable or excusable; a lavishness in appropriations truly alarming, and a looseness in the administration of the Indian affairs of the country that is culpable and disgraceful. It is time that there should be the severest retrenchment and reform in this regard. How is it to be attained? In my judgment the first great step toward it is to return to the early policy of the Government. Place the entire direction and control of this branch of the public service under the management of the War Department and get rid of the rings, the combinations, and the army of office-holders and employés who now control and direct it, many of whom are beyond question fattening upon the misfortunes and ignorance of the Indians and the stupidity and rascality of Government officials.

Mr. Chairman, is there a remedy, cannot the expenditures of the Government in this regard be reduced, and at the same time full justice be done to these people? To understand whether there is extravagance in the management of the Indian affairs of the Government, we must look into the organization of the Indian Bureau and see its workings and results. The organization of this Bureau in the Interior Department, with its chief and forty-one clerks and eleven copyists, messengers, and laborers, is kept up at an annual cost of $71,420. It is believed that by the proposed transfer one-half of this expenditure can be saved—perhaps greatly more. Then there is a commission appointed to serve without pay, but at a cost of $15,000 for expenses. For what purpose, let me inquire, was this commission appointed, and why is it that gentlemen of high and known integrity are called upon to serve in this capacity without compensation? The answer is, for years the cry had gone throughout the length and breadth of the land that the Government was defrauded in the purchase and the Indians were cheated in the amount and character of supplies furnished. The facts were so patent, and the scandal so great, the humiliating confession was made by Congress that the official power of the Government was so feeble these frauds could not be prevented without the charitable service of good and prominent men, who should see that justice was done the Indians in the pur-chase of supplies. It is the duty of this commission to inspect con-tracts, the quality of supplies, and vonchers for expenditures. This $15,000 item of expense can be saved by the purchase, delivery, and distribution of supplies in the same manner and under the same reg-ulations as now provided for Army supplies. The officers of the Army are specially educated to discharge such duties. They are amenable directly to punishment by court-martial if they fail in their duty. Their life positions as officers in the Army depend upon the prompt

Their life positions as officers in the Army depend upon the prompt and faithful discharge of their duties.

Next, you have three Indian inspectors, as an appendage to the Indian Bureau, at an annual salary of $3,000 each, and traveling expenses to the amount of $6,000, making a total saving in this item of $15,000, by dispensing with these officials. These inspectors, like the commissioners, were appointed to see that the Indians were not defrauded and to look after their general wants, but whose especial duty, I presume, it is to see that the superintendents and agents displaying their duties to the Government and to the Indians. charge their duties to the Government and to the Indians. May not their services be dispensed with? If the War Office is to direct this management there are regular commissioned officers of the Inspector-General's Department who inspect and report upon the condition of every branch of the military service, and would inspect this and report upon it as they now do of the Army proper. Then there are two superintendents, with a salary of $2,000 each, with clerks and copyists, making $4,600 more, and a general appropriation for southern super-intendency of $10,000, making a total for the two superintendencies, not counting incidentals included in other appropriations, of $18,000, which may be saved by cutting off these officials and transferring their duties, if necessary to be performed, to officers of the Army already receiving pay.

The object of these superintendencies being to look over the conduct of their agents and after the wants of the Indians under their content of the Indians under their content. trol, and, in the general management, to act as a kind of connecting link between agents under them and the Interior Department, may not their duties very properly devolve upon the major-generals of the Army, commanding departments in which Indians are located, and under them, upon brigadier-generals commanding military districts? The duties now performed by these officers are not so onerous as to be seriously interfered with by these additional require-

After the superintendents come sixty-nine agents at a salary of $1,500 each, one agent at $500, and seven special agents at $1,500 each, making a total for agents of $114,500; also an appropriation of $10,000 for buildings and repairs at agencies, and $36,000 in two different items for contingencies, including traveling, incidental, current, and contingent expenses of superintendents and agents and of their of-In this connection it will be interesting, and I believe time well spent, to look at the number and character of the employés of these numerous agencies and the cost to the Government for their

By reference to the Official Register of 1875, beginning on page 359 and ending on page 371, will be found the name of each agency and agent, the name and occupation of each employé, and the pay of each. We find seventy-eight agencies, with seventy-seven agents, (whose salaries have already been mentioned,) and six hundred and thirty employés whose pay amounts to $456,055. These employés include physicians, clerks, commissaries and assistant commissaries, teachers and assistant teachers, carpenters, blacksmiths and assistant blacksmiths, wagonmakers, shoemakers, laborers, superintendents of farming, farmers and assistant farmers, cooks, laundresses, matrous, seaming, farmers and assistant farmers, cooks, laundresses, matrons, seam-stresses, gunsmiths, interpreters, engineers, industrial teachers, saw-yers, wheelwrights, butchers, bakers, messengers, detectives and special detectives, herders, chief herders and assistant herders, millers, su-perintendents of schools, teamsters, superintendents of labor, ferry-men, head chiefs, chiefs of police, apprentices, watchmen, and masons. There are forty-four physicians, with salaries amounting to $49,900. The Indians have their own native physicians or medicine-men, and seem as prone to be imposed upon by quacks as our own race. They have root and herb doctors, cold-water doctors, steam doctors, faith doctors, and the more civilized tribes regular-bred physicians. Some of the tribes have a rule that when a doctor is unlucky and loses a number of patients he may be killed by the relatives with impunity. I am not sure that it is a bad rule, and that it might not be enforced with propriety among more civilized people.

It is also observable that out of the seventy-eight agencies there are nearly one-half of them without physicians. Now, if these can get along without a physician, why not the others? But, sir, if transferred to the War Department, such medical aid as may be needed can be furnished without great cost, and this item of $49,900, or a large part of it, may be saved.

The agents, clerks, herders, butchers, teamsters, superintendents of schools, farmers, commissioners, watchmen, masons, bakers, messengers, cooks, matrons and assistant matrons, laundresses, seamstresses, chiefs of police, apprentices, and detectives may well be dispensed with. When the duties of any one of these may be necessary, they can be discharged by commissioned and non-commissioned officers and privates of the regular Army. There is something exceedingly ludicrous in the idea of employing cooks at salaries, ranging from $350 to $600 per annum, to dress and prepare the beef issued to the Indians. In the list of employés you will find that France and China have contributed their entered to the land of the contributed their entered to the land of the contributed their entered to the land of the contributed their entered to the contributed their ente have contributed their quota to prepare the beef rations in a manner that will give it a relish and make it tempting to the delicate palates of these naked warriors, who, before these refining influences of civilization were thrust upon them, were in the habit of taking their meat cold, straight, and raw. But, as ludicrous as this may appear, it pales into insignificance to the fact that matrons and assistant matrons are furnished to some of the more favored and aristocratic tribes, to aid in the rearing of their delicate and tender papooses, to teach the mothers how to nurse and wrap them properly, to pass them through the teething stage, and indicate the proper period when they should be weaned, and laundresses to wash and iron their linen and do up their garments in the most approved and fashionable style, after they have been fitted, cut, and made up by the seamstresses. Without going further into the details of the expenses and necessity of these employes at the agencies, it is safe to say that one-half of the expenditures so incurred may be saved to the Government, say $228,-277 per annum. Indeed, more than this may be saved, because the salaries of teachers may be cut down with propriety. The farmers, blacksmiths, wheelwrights, and other necessary laborers who receive small salaries, as a rule, may be left untouched. In connection with these expenditures, it will be proper to call at-In connection with these expenditures, it will be proper to can attention to the extraordinary item paid to printers and papers by the Indian Bureau, for printing or advertising, amounting to within a fraction of $45,000. This amount is paid out in items ranging from three to five thousand dollars. It is divided between one hundred and fifty newspapers or printers, making an average to each of about $300, which is certainly a very heavy contribution from one Bureau of a Department to the public press of the country. By reference to the Official Register it will be observed that some of these newspapers received large amounts. One received $5,659.44; another, $4,469.50; four, over $2,000 each; six, $1,000 each; eleven, over $500 each, and twenty-four, over $100 each. Certainly the advertising for the Indian Bureau, if transferred to the War Department, in connection with the advertisements for Army supplies, might be reduced at least one-half, say $25,000, thus saving $20,000 in this expenditure.

It may not be amiss to refer to section 5 of the act of March 3, 1875, which says that "hereafter not more than $6,000 shall be paid in any one year for salaries or compensation of employés at any agency, in addition to the salaries of agent," with this proviso at the end of the section: "that in case it should be necessary at any agency to have more employés than are provided for in this section the Secretary may by written orders, authorize the necessary increase, but in no case shall the amount expended exceed $10,000 in any one year, and that the provision of this section shall apply to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875." By reference to the Register it will be seen that the 1875." By reference to the Register it will be seen that the following agencies exceed the limit of $10,000 for salaries of employés, namely: San Carlos, $10,800; Red Cloud, $11,180; Nez Percé, $11,480; Osage, $14,420; Yakama, $10,300; and twenty-four agencies exceed $6,000 and one where it costs $2,050 to pay out $7.000 to the Indians.

Thus it will be seen, by cutting down the Indian Bureau one-half, and reducing the expense of that branch of the service transacted at Weshington.

Washington; by dispensing with the commissioners, inspectors, agents, superintendents, and the expenses incident to each; and by reducing the number of persons employed at the agencies, a reduction may be made of $490,000. These reductions are only proposed to be made in the organization, machinery, and workings of the Indian Bureau and its appendages. But there are other fields equally as promising in rich results that should be carefully explored.

In the appropriation act of 1875 there occurs an item of $30,000 for contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling, incidental, current, and contingent expenses of superintendents and agents, and of their offices; certainly a very liberal allowance. There are two other items which add $6,000 more for the same purpose. In the same act, it will be seen, that the tribes in the Territories of Arizona, Colorado, Dakots, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and the Indian Territory, and in the States of California, Oregon, and Necessia and the States of California, Oregon, and Necessia and States of California a vada, are provided for in the general provisions of the act under their respective names; and subsequently in the act additional appropriations are made for each State and Territory mentioned, under such general and comprehensive items, as follows:

For the general and incidental expenses of the Indian service, in the Territory of Arizona, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and to sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, and for educational purposes, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $65,000.

For New Mexico, $40,000; being an addition of $105,000 to $450,000 previously appropriated in the same act for these two Territories. the same manner and for the same purposes, California received an additional sum of $60,000; Colorado, $5,000; Dakota, $20,000; Idaho, $10,000; Montana, $20,000; Nevada, $35,000; Oregon, $45,000; Utah, $20,000; Washington, $25,000; Wyoming, $5,000—aggregating $350,000 to be expended under the general direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and for Indians who had been mainly provided for previously in the same act. In the general provisions of the act, Oregon received $53,200 for tribes mentioned by their names, besides the $45,000 just referred to. In another part of the act for the Malheur reservation, in the same State, $35,000 more are appropriated for the general purpose of civilization, subsistence, education, care of the sick, for the support of the aged, helpless, orphans, and in other respects to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement.

The great bulk of the last appropriations referred to do not seem to have been made in pursuance of any treaty obligations, but appear simply as an enormous gratuity, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. However just and pure that officer may be, the placing such large sums at his sole disposal, and in such sweeping and loose terms, is certainly not wise or commendable legislation. At a time when the Treasury is so burdened as at present, prudence would seem to require an accurate knowledge of the necessity of such large and indiscriminate grants of money and power, as well as great care, and certainty in directing the bounties of the Government in such manner as to insure their reaching the objects of its charity, instead of being squandered on favorites, or in perpetuating political power.

I cannot, Mr. Chairman, leave this branch of my subject without asking your attention, and that of the committee, to some other feat-asking your attention, and that of the committee, to some other reatures of the last Indian appropriation bill.

For the Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches of the Indian Territory there was appropriated $67,700 under treaty stipulations. For the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Wichitas, Kiowas, and Comanches, for their subsistence, $300,000; and for the affiliated bands of Wichitas, Caddoes, and Comanches of the same Territory, there were appropriated, for the purchase of goods, provisions, and other articles, as the President may from time to time determine, and for the purpose of instructing them in agricultural and mechanical purposits educaof instructing them in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, education, medicine and medical attendance, for the support of the aged, sick, orphans, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $50,000, and still another appropriation of $300,000 for the support of three thousand captive Arapaho, Cheyenne, Kiowa, and Comanche Indians, and for their education and civiliza-tion. These Indians are members of the same tribes the appropriations for whom aggregate $764,400, and which bands and tribes (with the exception of the affiliated Caddoes, Wichitas, Tawacairoes, Keechies, Wacoes, and one hundred and sixty-five Comanches) have made constant war upon Texas, and a large number of whom openly defied the power of the General Government for eighteen months. These Indians have been under treaty obligations with the Government for many years; yet they have openly and most flagrantly violated them in years; yet they have openly and most flagrantly violated them in hundreds and hundreds of instances. Still the appropriations for their support, education, civilization, and for the promotion of their comfort, and for the relief of their aged, sick, helpless, and orphans, continue to be made. Are there not thousands of aged, sick, and helpless of our own people whom we cannot provide for? And have we not many old soldiers of the war of 1812, and of the Mexican war, who appeal to us in vain for a recognition of their services, and others of them who fell upon the fields of their country's glory, and others who have died, whose widows and orphans her a pittance at your hands. have died, whose widows and orphans beg a pittance at your hands, but are denied? Let the American Congress be just to the soldiers of the Republic, and to their widows and orphans, before it lavishes thousands, nay millions, in feeble attempts to civilize and make comthousands, hay mittions, in reconstruction that the com-fortable lazy and treacherous savages, whose hands are recking with the blood of our citizens, and whose atrocious cruelties and brutal outrages upon captive women have no parallel in the annals of the most barbarous people.

I desire also to call attention to the appropriations for the different bands of Sioux Indians, which aggregate $1,785,600. Of this amount $159,400 are to be expended under the tenth article of the treaty of April 29, 1868, in the purchase of clothing for males over fourteen years of age; in the purchase of flannel, hose, calico, and domestics, required for females over twelve years of age, and for such flannel and cotton goods as may be necessary for boys and girls. There are twenty-four similar annual installments yet due, or, in round numbers, yet to be provided, $3,825,600, which is to purchase clothing for a set of vagabonds who never dreamed of any covering except a blanket or buffalo-robe in winter, and a breech-cloth in sum-

There is another item of $1,000,000 for the purchase of beef, flour, sugar, and bacon, which refers to no treaty obligation that I can see, but is merely a gratuity to a people who had subsisted on the spoils of the chase, and were utterly strangers to bacon, flour, and sugar.

There is still another item for a portion of the Sioux of $100,000, which is to be applied, as the President may direct, "to the promotion of their civilization, comfort, and improvement."

These items of the last appropriation for Indians have been referred to simply to call attention to the fact that many of them are made where no treaty stipulation seems to require them; and to show the further fact that abuses have been gradually creeping into the management of our Indian affairs, both in the making of treaties and in appropriating money for the Indians, which should be corrected. Whether the transfer is made to the War Department or not, I believed the state of th lieve a very large reduction in expenditures can properly be made, and every treaty and moral obligation due from the Government to the Indians be carried out in good faith. If the transfer is made, the reduction in the expense in the management of them will amount to at least $1,000,000.

But I favor the transfer for a higher and more important reason than that of economy. It is one of the highest duties of the Government to afford adequate and sure protection to the lives and property of its people on the border. It is as incumbent on the Government to do this as it is to repel invasion by a foreign foe, or to protect our commerce and the lives and property of our people from pirates on the high seas. Notwithstanding this highest duty of government, the people along the line of our border settlements have been a continued prey to the perfidy and treachery of the Indians. It is to the interest of the officers and soldiers of the Army to preserve peace with the Indians. Their comfort and their lives depend, in a measure, upon it.

Those of us acquainted with the Indians of the plains know full well that if the troops were withdrawn, and full rations with clothing issued to them, with the wisest and best of agents to control them, they could not be restrained from plunder and murder. In Texas, and in the territory adjacent thereto, the peace policy has had full opportunity for trial, and it has proved a lamentable and most distressing failure. Notwithstanding the renewed treaties entered into with the Comanches, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Apaches by the Government, directly after the war; and notwithstanding General Custer's severe winter campaign a few years thereafter—when their outrages had become unendurable on the Kansas border—which resulted in a terrible battle with much loss of life to our troops, but in a serious defeat to the Indians; and notwithstanding ample provision was made, and large reservations of land selected for them in a region of country well adapted to their wants and habits, and every effort made to induce them to peaceful habits, yet, sir, in despite of these efforts, and with troops scattered along the whole line of the frontier, these Indians kept up their murderous forays upon the whole extent of our outside settlements, often penetorays upon the whole extent of our outside settlements, often pene-trating between the military posts far into the interior settled coun-ties of the State, sometimes in bodies of one to two hundred warriors, attacking neighborhoods in the broad sunlight of day, murdering all who fell in their way, carrying women and children into a cap-tivity worse than death, destroying property, and stealing thousands of horses and cattle. This state of things existed on our border be-fore the war, and with an exception of about eight months just after the war it has continued until the last twelve or eighteen months. Owing to the energy of such gallant officers as Mackenzie, Miles, and others of the Army and our own State troops, and the energy of General Ord, for some time past we have had comparative immunity from the Indians. But so severe have these depredations been from In-dians, who had treaties with the Government, that Texas has been cuans, who had treaties with the Government, that Texas has been compelled to keep State troops in the field since 1870, and up to this time, at a cost to the State of about $1,000,000, which we believe the General Government justly owes us, and which, in my candid judgment, is traceable to the peace policy that has been pursued, and which would have been prevented, besides the great saving of life and property, if the Indians had been under the control of the military, with authority to punish them for infractions of their treaty obligations.

Mr. Chairman, I have before me an official prest of Great News

Mr. Chairman, I have before me an official report of General William Steele, the adjutant-general of Texas, containing a tabular statement of Indian depredations in Texas since 1866, giving the date of incursions, the date of murders and robberies, the names of the victims killed and those carried into captivity, and the counties and places of their residence. It is a closely-written document of twentytwo pages, and does not pretend to give all the casualties that have occurred, but such as have come through official sources. It foots up 120 persons killed; 28 wounded; 36 carried into captivity; 19 attacked who escaped; horses stolen, 10,064; cattle stolen, 12,555; the United States mail-coach plundered; 1 Government contractor's train robbed and destroyed, and 7 of the teamsters killed and burned, (and a fact not stated in the report, but within the knowledge of his comrades who escaped, that one of the wounded men was tied to a wagon-who escaped, that one of the wounded men was tied to a wagon-wheel and burned while stilk-alive,) with other casualties mentioned in the report, which I will not repeat.

Accompanying the report is an extract from a communication addressed by the governor of Texas, August 5, 1867, to E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, which transmits officially received information of depredations by the Indians after the war, and up to July, 1867, showing the murder of 162 persons, the captivity of 43, the wounding of 24, with the loss of over 30,000 head of cattle, 3,781 head of horses, and 2,430 goats. In a letter accompanying the report, General Steele says that the partial returns made to his office falls far short of the actual truth.

Mr. Chairman, will the story be believed when told that captive Mr. Chairman, will the story be believed when told that captive women and children have been taken to Indian reservations, to which fathers have followed them only to find that the power of the Government was so feeble and its laws and treaties so feebly enforced that they were powerless to obtain a release of the prisoners, and that weeks, and often months, have elapsed before their freedom could be secured through purchase? But occurrences like these, so hamiliating to the Government, and repugnant to every feeling of the proposed to the proposed to the proposed to the government. humanity, have often happened to citizens of Texas, under the opera-tions of the benign "peace policy." Sometimes these poor victims have been carried great distances from Texas to remote localities, where they have been ransomed by agents, United States officers, or traders.

I remember twenty-three women and children returned to the authorities of Texas by the kindness and generosity of a gentleman who was a trader near some post or agency on the Kansas border. On another occasion a mother and four daughters were restored through the kindness of United States officers. I am acquainted with that the kindness of United States onicers. I am acquainted with that family, and know the story of their captivity. On a Sabbath day, the husband, with his family, was going from one settlement to another. The husband was murdered and scalped, the mother, an infant, and four daughters captured, the mother and daughters tied and lashed with thongs of raw-hide on horses. The mother was allowed to keep her babe, but as they traveled in haste, on account of its continuous cryping, it was snatched from her and its brains dashed out against a tree and the corpse thrown down as they passed rapidly Who can realize that mother's feelings? But the anguish exon. Who can realize that inother's feelings? But the angular experienced at that terrible deed was nothing when compared to her future sufferings. Her own tortures, and the terrible and heart-rending cruelties perpetrated upon her helpless daughters, within her sight, are too horrible and atrocious to be described by human lansight, are too horrible and atrocious to be described by human language. A thousand times over would death's dark angel have been a welcome relief. But the poor victims survived. I saw them after their ransom, and more pitiable objects, with their scars and wounds still upon them, no eye ever beheld. But, sir, such pictures of suffering are sickening, and are referred to with reluctance, and only that you, who live so far away as not to know of them, may be admonished not to let a sickly sentimentality influence you in behalf of a race many tribes of whom have scarcely one redeeming quality, and who glory in deeds so atrocious and marders so foul that humanand who glory in deeds so atrocious and murders so foul, that humanand who giory in deeds so atrocious and murders so four, that humanity sickens at the bare mention of them.

I would not apply this language to all of the Indian tribes, and even among those to whom more particular reference is made, the Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, and Arapahoes, there are some who have observed their treaty obligations. The Caddoes and Toshewa's band of Comanches and some others deserve honorable mention. Others cannot be restrained except by the strong arm of the Government and then it must be made manifest to them that numishment. ment, and then it must be made manifest to them that punishment shall quickly follow every violated pledge.

In my judgment, every violated piedge.

In my judgment, every civil agent should be dispensed with, except to a very few of the civilized tribes who have regularly administered laws and governments of their own. Even these I believe to be unnecessary. To others, where local agents are necessary, there should be officers of the Army detailed for the purpose; officers of experience, whose age would entitle them to be relieved from active duty in the field; and the employes at the agencies should be, as a rule, non-commissioned officers and privates of the Army, for the reason that in such management an important point to be kept constantly in view is discipline and subordination. As a matter of economy and accountability to one common head, it is also commendable.

Again, it is a refined cruelty to the Indians to keep them cooped up on the reservations. The God of nature created them with habits and on the reservations. The God of nature created them with habits and instincts that lead them to the chase, to the waters of running streams, to grass-covered valleys, and widely extended plains. They should be permitted to indulge in these natural desires, for the purpose of obtaining food and skins and furs. And, further, that restraint should not create disgust and discontent. They should have reservations to be known as their permanent homes, and when they go in bodies on their regular spring, summer, and fall hunting expeditions, they should be accompanied with a few soldiers, whose duty it should be to direct their movements, in accordance with the permission granted by their agents. Even the wild tribes are to some extent a pastoral people, at least to the extent of rearing horses, and efforts pastoral people, at least to the extent of rearing horses, and efforts pastoral people, at least to the extent of rearing holes, and chorts should be made to induce them to raise cattle, sheep, hogs, and goats. They will more readily become herdsmen than farmers, though agriculture with them should not be omitted. The military posts, except as to the most vicious and turbulent tribes, should not be too near the reservations. Kindness and a faithful discharge of every obligation promised by treaty should be the rule and a strict compliance on promised by treaty should be the rule, and a strict compliance on promised by treaty should be the rule, and a strict compliance on their part with every pledge should be firmly and rigidly enforced. Such are my views, Mr. Chairman; and I believe, if this transfer is made and the Army held responsible for an energetic and faithful management of the Indian affairs of the country, that it will result at once in the saving of at least $1,000,000 to the Treasury, and in the end to millions more that otherwise will have to be paid for arduous winter and summer campaigns against the disaffected and discontacted tribes. discontented tribes.

The peace policy has had a long and fair trial. General Canby fell a victim to it in California. It failed in Arizona, and General Crook was sent to the rescue. It failed on the border of Kansas, and Custer made his famous winter march and gallant fight to prevent the sacrifice of more victims there. McKenzie and Miles and others on the borders of Texas and in the Indian Territory made their brilliant campaigns, but a little while since, at great cost, and some of them in intensely cold weather, to correct its evils in that quarter.

The results of this policy, so far as Texas is concerned, have been most deplorable. Dwellings and property destroyed, blackened ruins, murdered victims, whole neighborhoods broken up, entire families destroyed, with the torture and anguish of violated women, are the monuments of everlasting infamy erected to its unhallowed memory along the entire border of our State.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PAWNEE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BOONE. Mr. Speaker, the special order for to-day was the consideration of the bill for the sale of the Pawnee Indian reservation. I move that the special order be postponed until Tuesday next, after the morning hour, with the understanding that it is not to interfere with appropriation bills and that it shall continue from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. KEHR. There is a special order for that day, as I understand it—the steamboat bill.

Mr. BOONE. I understand there is no such special order for that day.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to making it the special order from day

Mr. HUKLBUI. I object to making it the special order from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. BOONE. Very well; let it be the special order for next Tuesday after the morning hour, not to interfere with appropriation bills. There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ANGELICA HAMMOND.

On motion of Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Angelica Hammond, no adverse report having been

WESLEY JONES.

On motion of Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Wesley Jones, an applicant for a pension, no adverse report having been made.

MRS. SIDNEY WOOD.

On motion of Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, leave was also granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mrs. Sidney Wood, an applicant for a pension, no adverse report having been made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, on account of important business, to Mr. Cowan for ten days; to Mr. Woodwortin for one week; to Mr. Hubbell until next Monday; to Mr. James B. Reilly for three days; and to Mr. Jenks for three days from next Monday; and the leave of absence granted heretofore to Mr. King was extended three weeks.

MAJOR ARTHUR W. ALLEN.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, required to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence between the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General, and all reports, orders, papers, proceedings, and testimony in reference to the trial by court-martial of Major Arthur W. Allen, commandant of the military post at Jackson, in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. HOOKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS UPON RESERVED GOVERNMENT SECTIONS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2818) for the relief of settlers upon the reserved Government sections of the public lands within railroad limits; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB THIERER.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2819) for the relief of Jacob Thierer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MINING RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2820) to amend an act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. HURLBUT, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

A bill (H. R. No. 2324) to amend section 3 of chapter 137 of the acts of the year 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 2256) to provide for filling the office of clerk of the district court of the United States at Greenville, South Carolina; and A bill (H. R. No. 2811) to remove the political disabilities of C. H. Williamson, of New York.

The bill (H. R. No. 1970) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Arizona was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. No. 876) making it a misdemeanor for any person in the employ of the United States to demand or contribute election funds was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill came from the Judiciary Committee of the House, and I would suggest, unless there be some special reason why it should not take that course, that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary here.

Mr. HAMLIN. Whom does it affect?

Mr. DAVIS. It affects the entire service, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It relates to political contributions.

The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I think, if any bill should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that certainly should. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia

Mr. DAVIS. I suggested that as the bill had come from the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggested that as the bill had come from the Judiciary Committee of the House probably it had better go to that committee of the Senate. There are some legal questions probably connected with it, although I do not know that there are. I have no choice as to what committee the bill is to be referred. I only want it to go to the appropriate committee.

Mr. HOWE. I think, if the Senator has no special reason for sending it to the Judiciary Committee, there are no questions of law involved in it which almost any committee of the Senate cannot wrestle with; but if it concerns any particular branch of business under this Government it is that of elections; and therefore I hope the Senator from West Virginia will allow it to go to that committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if there be no objection.

RELIEF OF SIOUX INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Resoled, That the Senate insist on its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of O. P. Dow, James Smith, and other citizens of Palmyra, Wisconsin, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, remonstrating against the construction of a bridge across the Detroit River, and in favor of a tunnel to be constructed at a point where competent engineers have determined that it is entirely practicable and adequate to secure all the advantages sought to be obtained by the railways; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Saint Croix River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of amendments to the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of James Fish, Willard Weller, and other citizens of Meriden, New York, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. It relates to the Federal jurisdiction generally, I see, but I suppose it may go appropriately to that committee. I present also a similar petition, signed by George K. Hawley, W. W. Rockwell, and other citizens of Glen's Falls, New York, closing with the same prayer. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial of 530 pensioners of the State of New York, who are paid in person at the pension agencies, remonstrating against the abolition of local agencies; and a like memorial of 525 pensioners of the State of New York, who are paid in like manner, in person, at the agencies, remonstrating, for reasons which they give, and give persuasively, against the proposed change. Other petitions on this subject having gone to the Committee on Pen-

Other petitions on this subject having gone to the Committee on Pensions, I move that these take that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That committee was discharged from their consideration yesterday, and they were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. INGALLS. As the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of those petitions, I suggest to the Senator from New York that the petitions he now presents should be referred to the committee to evaluate the several breakers of the civil service. the committee to examine the several branches of the civil service.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not remark the reconsideration of the former reference. Had I been here, however, I would have suggested that in the other House this subject has been considered by the Committee on Pensions, and action has been taken by that committee. Although I know that the subject is embraced by general inclusion within the scope of the authority given to the special committee referred to, I am inclined to think that the Committee on Pensions ought to consider it. However, I have no choice of committee. The chairman of these two committees will settle it satisfactorily to them-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present a remonstrance of a like character to those which have just been presented by the Senator from New York, signed by nearly 400 pensioners of the State of Maine, who are paid at Bangor. They remonstrate against any change. They know their own conveniences; they know how they are now accommodated better than any other class of men can know; and I think their wishes ought to be heeded.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is that a remonstrance against the regulation of the Pension Office in regard to geographical limits?

Mr. HAMLIN. No.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a remonstrance against the proposition to abolish local pension agencies, and transfer the whole thing to the War Department, and make pensions payable by drafts to be emitted from here and sent in each instance over the country to those who are to receive them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of William Richards, of Washington, District of Columbia, attorney for the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, praying for the passage of an act directing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to refund a tax of $4,536.39, illegally assessed upon gross receipts derived from carrying the mails by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, and paid by that company after the tax had been abolished by pany, and paid by that company after the tax had been abolished by law; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of a large number of citizens of Ohio, setting out that they have "observed with alarm and indignation the introduction into Congress of a scheme for tariff reducnation the introduction into Congress of a scheme for tariff reduction, prepared, as we believe, not by members of Congress, for the benefit of this country and its inhabitants, but by adherents of other nations, for the benefit of foreigners." They remonstrate against any change in the present laws, and pray "that, when alterations are made therein, at a more favorable time, counsel may be taken from our own countrymen and constituents, rather than from the industrial and commercial enemies of the country." I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Virgil Sparks, William S. Wood, and other citizens of Wawarsing, Ulster County, New York, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of David Winn, H. A. Price, and other citizens of Illinois, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of workingmen of the Star Iron-Works, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, remonstrating against any change in the present constitution of the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Franklin Institute, of Philadelphia, praying for the repeal of the act permitting increased boiler pressure on steam-vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of George H. Ritter, Henry Aaron, and other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented three petitions of L. J. Whitson, Isaac Broomell, and other citizens of Penningtonville, Pennsylvania, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of M. M. Bailey, E. Pennock, and other citizens of Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Pennsylvania Temperance Union, James Black, president, and D. C. Babcock, secretary, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors:

tories, the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors;

that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service: and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN. Memorials have been presented and I wish now to suggest to the Senate, as we have voted to adjourn over until Monday, that it is very important that the post-route bill should pass. I ask the Senate now to take it up and consider it in the morning hour, so that we shall not interfere with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] who is entitled to the floor at one o'clock on the electoral bill. I move the present consideration of the post-route bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will be stated by the Secretary in the progress of the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will make a very brief statement to the Senate, and perhaps no Senator will ask that the bill shall be read at length, which would take the best part of an hour. The Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have given to the consideration of this post-route bill much more care and attention than such bills have ordinarily received. We have first requested the indement of the post-route bill much more care and attention than such bills have ordinarily received. We have first requested the judgment of the Senator who has introduced a proposition for a post-route, in order to ascertain that there was a public utility and necessity for his amendment. We have done the same thing in regard to amendments proposed by members of the House which have been sent here. I have myself called personally upon every member who proposed an amendment, and have made an inquiry into the character of the route sought to be established. Several propositions were not entertained, and are not therefore included in the bill; but where the member gave such a statement as to induce us to believe they were proper they were admitted. When memorials and resolutions of State Legislatures were presented to this body and showed satisfactorily upon their face proper cases to be included, those cases have been included. Those embrace all the amendments of the committee save another class Those embrace all the amendments of the committee save another class which have been transmitted to us from the Post-Office Department. Under that statement of the case, if there be no call upon the part of any Senator, I ask that the reading of the bill may be dispensed with. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill? The Chair hears none. The question will be taken many agreeing to the avendments recovered.

with the reading of the birl. The chair heats hole. The question will be taken upon agreeing to the amendments reported.

Mr. HAMLIN. And if nobody wants to separate the amendments, I ask that the question be taken upon all of them together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the question being taken upon the amendment in gross? The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendments in gross. The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to submit an amendment. I move to insert after line 628—

From Chardon to Chester Cross Roads.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I find that the House inserted, on pages 35 and 36, the same route twice. It could do no harm, but it should not be in the bill. I therefore move to strike out of the bill lines 863 and 864, as follows:

From Petersburgh, in Grant County, via Patterson-Creek turnpike, to Burlington, Mineral County.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I send to the Clerk's desk certain amendments, which are merely corrections of orthography.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, line 489, it is proposed to strike out "Tokama" and insert "Tokama;" and in line 490 to strike out "Schmidt" and insert "Schwedt."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. PADDOCK. There are still other corrections.

Mr. PADDOUK. There are still other corrections.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 492, page 21, it is proposed to strike out "Fairburg" and insert "Fairbury;" in line 494, strike out "Gem Rock" and insert "Glen Rock;" in line 495, strike out "Carrieo" and insert "Carrico;" in line 496, strike out "La Murieon" and insert "La Munyon;" and in line 503, strike out "Keatscatoon" and insert "Keatsatoose."

The appendment was accord to

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to remark in this connection that, as this bill was prepared in the other House, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate is not responsible for the errors in spelling. I move on page 22 to strike out lines 520, 521, 522, 523, in the following words:

From Columbus, Platte County, via Monroe, Keatscotoose, Genoa, Woodville, Waterville, Boone, Albion, Oxford, Raeville, O'Neile City, Nebraska, to Custer City, Dakota Territory.

It will be observed that the same route is provided for in another part of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a typographical error on the first page. "Cropeville" should be "Cropville" The letter "e" should be omitted where it occurs in lines 7 and 9. That is all, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if he can tell us approximately how many miles of new post-routes this bill establishes!

Mr. HAMLIN. I cannot.
Mr. EDMUNDS. How many in point of number?
Mr. HAMLIN. The bill itself will present that fact, though I have not counted them. I will say, however, that a very large number of the routes established in the bill are from one single point to another upon which service has been had for long years, what is called special service. The bill makes a very large number of them post-routes. They have been sent to us, and have been expressed as desirable, from the Department, because it makes a certain service, and makes the service subject to bidding instead of giving the Department the opportunity of making a special contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that by law now the Postmaster-General is authorized to put what is called special service over any road or railroad in the country that Congress has not established as a post-route?

Mr. HAMLIN. I mean to say that from a post-office on a route already established, whether it be a railroad or another route, to one single point, the Postmaster-General has, ever since I have known anything about it, and that I suppose is the law, been authorized to establish a special service; that is, from that office which is now establish. tablish a spectal service; that is, from that once which is now exactlished by law to a given point, making the compensation for transporting the mail over that route dependent upon the compensation arising from the office established. You have got such service in Vermont in very many cases. We have it in every State in the Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to say that we have a good many things in Vermont that we ought not to have, and have not some things that I think we ought to have. If that is the law I am sorry, because it vests a boundless discretion in the Post-Office Department. Before I am thoroughly satisfied that it is the law, I should be glad to have my honorable friend from Maine point out that part of the statute which confers that power. I dare say he is correct. I am not by any means

But what I rose chiefly to say, Mr. President, was, in this day of economy, to put the question whether here is not a good opportunity to economize? We all know from experience that when these routes are once established by law, although the Postmaster-General is not obliged to put service upon them, he is besieged by Senators and members of Congress (of whom I count myself one of the chief because the contract the con siegers) to put on the service, and the most frequent service; because everybody likes to get a letter once in ten minutes if he can—the most frequent service; because everybody likes to get a letter once in ten minutes if he can—the most frequent service possible. The consequence is, as a practical result, although it may be trifling in one particular instance, when you apply it to thousands, when you sum it all up, a very heavy drain is made upon the public revenues. The question that has occurred to me is, in these times, whether we could not beneficially to public interests, taking into view the interests of the Treasury and of the tax-payers as well as the interests of people who wish to send or receive letters, be exceedingly conservative in respect of establishing new post-routes. The Post-Office Department, as we all know, always has been, and is likely always to be, if we go on in this way, not self-sustaining, and a tax of several millions of dollars each year is imposed upon the people of the United States to keep it up. Of course, it is a very worthy object when properly managed, as I have no doubt it is now, a very desirable object; but if we can economize in diminishing the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, though the result is to make the people of the various States submit to some little inconvenience in respect of the celerity with which their letters are transmitted to some point close to their homes, I think we shall be doing a good thing. Therefore it is that I ask whether we have not here a point where, instead of launching out into these new expenditures, because that is what the effect of the bill is, we may not say that for this year we shall not establish any new post-routes at all, just as we have said, in substance, that we will not build any fortifications at all, and so on.

I am not prepared to make any special motion about it, because I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject of this bill to do so. Undoubtedly there are some items in it that are of prime public necessity; but taking it as a whole, considering the enormous proportions of this bill and the tens, and perhaps hundreds, of thousands of miles of service that are established in it, it has occurred to me whether here is not a golden opportunity to preserve the Treasury without do-ing any serious detriment for the time being to the interests of the people of the United States. I should like to hear from my friend from Maine upon that topic.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no doubt myself if we look around us we may find many opportunities in retrenching the expenses of this Government in the manner which the Senator from Vermont has suggested. We might amend the law and declare that Senators and Representatives in Congress should receive no compensation for their services for this year, because it is a hard time. We might abolish any particular branch of the public service for this year because it is a hard time; and we might replenish the Treasury in almost any direction by pursuing as rigid a rule for the various branches as the Senator suggests in relation to post-routes.

If the Senator will look at the bill, he will see that the new routes are mainly made up in the new States and Territories where the population is increasing with great rapidity, where people are going to inhabit and cultivate the lands; and it does seem to me that they are entitled to some mail facilities.

I wish to say to the Senator what I had already stated before the Senator came in, that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have examined this bill with a great deal more of care than any postroute bill that has ever gone through that committee since I have been a member of it. We sought the information of the Senator who asked that a route should be established. We asked the information individually. There were some twenty amendments sent over by members of the House. I went over myself with each amendment and saw the member of the House who presented it, and he made to me a statement which led me to believe that the public exigencies fairly required that the route should be established. We then took one other class of cases, a few in number, which were asked for by petitions, which stated the case, and upon inquiry at the Post-Office Department finding the information generally corroborated, we included them. There is one other class, three cases only I remember, of memorials from State Legislatures, which set forth the necessity for certain routes. It is true, undoubtedly, that there may be some routes in the bill upon which service should not be placed, but it is utterly impossible for any one committee to decide those questions as wisely or as well as the Department can, or as well and wisely as the Department will, with all the pressure that may be brought upon it.

The Senator is incorrect in supposing that there is not a very considerable number of routes established upon which no service is placed—I mean for a considerable time, sometimes for years. While I concur fully with the Senator that it is desirable that we retrench our expenses in all possible ways, I think the facilities which will be granted by the establishment of these routes ought to induce us to pass the bill.

I want to say also to the Senator from Vermont that the committee is laboring very industriously for the purpose of finding some method by which the Post-Office Department shall be made, if not self-sustaining, much nearer to it than it now is; and I express the hope that we shall be able in a few days to make a report to the Senate, followed by other reports, which, if they shall meet the approving judgment of the legislative body, both House and Senate, will improve the financial condition of the Post-Office Department by some four or five or six million dollars. If Congress shall be able to accomplish such a result, we shall, I hope, bring the Department within the rule of being self-sustaining, or at least within that limit which will make it self-sustaining if we allow it an appropriation from the Treasury which shall be an equivalent annually for the service that the Government receives from the mails. That I would regard as self-sustaining, because I think we should not call upon any one class of our community to support the system exclusively for the benefit of the Government, as we should not call upon the Govern-ment to sustain it for parties outside, for whose benefit primarily it was originally established.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator, as I dare say he can tell us readily—I do not know myself—what the total amount of the Government postage for the last fiscal year, under this extraordinary stamp contrivance that we have, has amounted to; that is, the paper. Supposing the stamps had represented actual value, what would have been the whole amount of postage paid by the Government in the last fiscal year?

Mr. HAMLIN. I cannot give the Senator the precise figures, but I approximate very closely to it when I say $1,400,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, can the Senator tell me, as I have no doubt he can, (because I am sure he does not understand that I am criticising the committee; I am only making general observations,) how much the difference between receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department has been in the last fiscal year; and then, secondly, how much it was in the year before? so as to show to the Senate whether the difference between income and expenditures is increasing or diminishing, taking the last two fiscal years for comparison.

Mr. HAMLIN. I must reply again that I cannot give the precise figures, but I will give them very nearly. The deficiency of the Post-Office Department the year preceding the last fiscal year was in round numbers about $5,000,000; the last year about $6,000,000. The Post-master-General tells us that under the existing arrangement of the Department for the ensuing year it will be about $8,000,000. If think at the proper time, when I shall ask them to make such changes in the law as the committee believe to be desirable, I shall be able to demonstrate to the Senate that under existing laws our deficiency for the ensuing year will exceed $10,000,000. The Postmaster-General estimates it at about $8,000,000; it may be a few thousand dollars more or less; I do not recollect; but I am approximately accurate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The substance of it is that regularly we have what an ancient Commissioner of Agriculture used to call "a most gratifying increase of expenses over receipts." That seems to be the substance of it. Mr. HAMLIN.

That is so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And what I wish to get at is how far that constant increasing drain on the Treasury is attributable to the enormous extension of new post-routes. Can the Senator give us any information upon that topic?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is utterly impossible. It would be a very great labor to analyze the subject so that I could give a specific re-I do not think they know at the Post-Office Department. It is undoubtedly true that in the sparsely-settled portions of the country long routes are established over which the mail is transmitted from which we receive very slight revenues; but I think the Senator from Vermont will agree with me that the hardy pioneer who goes into the forest or on to the prairies has a right to ask for mails, and we are bound to extend to him, the frontierman, reasonable mail facilities. There is no process in the world by which you can do that if you shall require every route to be anything like self-sustaining.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the chairman of the committee if, in the book-keeping of the Post-Office Department, the amount which the Government pays for its own postage enters into the ex-

Mr. HAMLIN. It does not enter in.
Mr. DAWES. Then postage charged to the Government is in addi-

Mr. DAWES. Then postage charges to the the capenditures?

Mr. HAMLIN. I remarked a moment ago that the Postmaster-General had stated that the deficiency for the ensuing year would be $5,000,000, and that I thought I should be able to satisfy the Senate at the proper time that the deficiency would probably be $10,000,000; and I propose to do it by showing that the Postmaster-General in his $8,000,000 had not included a million and a half at least which the $8,000,000 had not included a million and a hair at least which the Government ought to pay, and will pay, and which should be added to this $8,000,000; and that and one other item will make the deficiency for the ensuing year, I think, $10,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if he has the data from which he can state whether there would be a penny's greater charge on the mails if the Government postage went free; if he has any idea that it would cost one penny more to carry the mail if the Government postage was abolished and its matter went free !

Mr. SARGENT addressed the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had not quite yielded the floor. I merely wish to say, in concluding, as I hope, what I have to say about this bill, that I am as much in favor of the hardy pioneer as my friend from Maine is; I consider myself to be one of that class; but when I look at this bill I find that the hardy pioneer lives in Maryland, and in Massachusetts, and, I dare say, in Vermont. I do not know how the bill is arranged, whether alphabetically or not. I do not see Vermont, but it is usually in.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is in the bill I suppose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not under take to make capital for my State; but the hardy pioneer lives in Illinois, and in Indiana, and in Georgia, in Pennsylvania, and so on. Therefore I do not think that this can be considered as a bill devoted chiefly to the interests of the hardy It is undoubtedly true that all the citizens of this country, whether they are pioneers or what they may be, are entitled to fair and equal privileges under the law; but it does not follow because I choose to go and set up a camp for fishing or shooting in some fastness of the mountains of Vermont or Maine, that all the other people of the United States are to be taxed forthwith in order that I may get my daily papers every morning when I get my breakfast. At least I do not think it does. They are entitled everywhere to what is reasonable undoubtedly; but what is reasonable in a question of this kind depends a good deal upon the condition of the country. If the country is overflowing with wealth and with prosperity, we can give to the citizens of all parts of the country the benefits of the Government, those affirmative benefits of public works, public improvements, and public intercommunication, in a large degree and with more justice and propriety than we can at other times. This is one of the other and propriety than we can at other times. This is one of the other times. Therefore the question, which I have opened with great diffi-dence, is, whether this is not the time to say that we will have no further post-routes for this year except in some very special emer-gency. The Senator says in answer to that, why, you need not vote any compensation to Senators and members of Congress. If it were proposed to vote additional compensation to Senators and members of Congress I should quite agree with him, although he probably knows, as I do, that the present compensation to Senators and mems, with the prices of things in this city, which we can no more control than we can the tides of the sea, does not afford an adequate sum to live upon, if a person, as we are, obliged to stay here more than half the time, has the advantage of having his family and his children with him, whatever he might do if he expatriated himself from his home and left all that was of home behind him. So that is not the point. This is entering upon a new field or an extended field of public service; and what I wish to impress upon the Senate as far as I can is, that in doing that we ought not at this time to go beyond the urgent necessity of each particular case, because, as it appears by the Post-Office reports and transactions, these new routes do very largely every year increase the public expenditure without anything like a corresponding increase of the public receipts.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. SARGENT. I think Congress made a great mistake when some years ago it substituted for the cheap method of dispatching Department business the costly one of printing stamps and putting them upon the communications which go out from the Department. By this means, the franking privilege in fact, or the unrestrained use of stamps, is permitted all over the country and to thousands of persons who never had it before. Under the policy of the old law, a person having a post-office the pay of which was $12 a year had the right to send his letters in regard to his post-office business free. It was a very strong limit on the franking privilege. In any other office the postmaster had to pay his postage. Perhaps I am mistaken in the limit, but it was something thereabouts, applying to a very low grade of post-offices. Under the present system, postage-stamps are sent to every post-office, to Boston, to New York, and to San Francisco, as well every post-office, to Boston, to New York, and to San Francisco, as well as to the little twelve-dollar post-offices, and there is no guarantee that I know of that these stamps are not liberally used for private correspondence. Furthermore, there is an apparent expenditure out of the Treasury of about a million and a half per annum which goes to swell the budget, and goes to show how extravagant Congress is in relation to the expenses of the Government. In fact, ten, fifteen, or twenty-five thousand dollars at the very outside are thrown away because it is used to print a stamp to put upon a document when the document might just as well go with a stroke of the pen. It does not take any more of the time of the clerk to write a name than it does for the clerk to lick a postage-stamp, while the abuse which I refer to of the indiscriminate and improper use of stamps cannot exist in to of the indiscriminate and improper use of stamps cannot exist in the other offices, because it is only at headquarters that they have a right to use this method of dispatching documents.

And then, again, there is a class of clerks who are compelled to be employed in order to keep the accounts of these postage-stamps. Altogether it is an expensive system. The Government probably is annually paying out of its pocket something about $100,000 to administer this law, which saves the franking privilege, while it is not receiving a dollar's benefit and is probably swindled every day by the unauthorized use of stamps. I think a very decided reform—and I commend it to the Post-Office Committee—would be to abolish this system, so far as the Departments are concerned at any rate, of using stamps. Let us come down to first principles. It would not cost a dollar more to carry the mails without the stamps than with them; dollar more to carry the mails without the stamps than with them; the Government would not be compelled to spend a dollar, while it would save all this expense of scales to weigh the mailable matter of the Department, of clerks to affix postage-stamps, of clerks to keep an account of the issue of postage-stamps, and would save the tempta-tion we now extend to every postmaster in the country for the illicit use of stamps. I think it would be a reform to put Senators and Representatives in communication with the people as they were before, under a proper law. Perhaps the law before was abused, but I believe the abuses were magnified; they were caricatured and not fairly stated. I think under a proper law that would restrain abuse we should allow a Senator or Representative to communicate with his constituents, to send them information on their business and the public business, and receive from them their petitions or their requests during the sessions of Congress or at any other time when it might be

But there are certain ways in which the Government benefits the people, as it seems to me, that justify government, justify its existence. One of these methods is by means of the courts which we keep open at very large expense. We have our judges, our jurors, our marshals, our machinery of justice, bringing of course no revenue to the Government of the United States—an expensive process, but it protects the citizen in his life, in his liberty, in his property. For that reason they are important, and we do not ask the question whether they are a burden on the Treasury or not. We only guard

There are other matters, perhaps even of a more speculative nature, as for instance the Signal Service. If we are rigorously and sternly economical this year and determine to cut off everything which the Government could exist without, we might cut off the Signal Service. Of course there would not be a warning at Cape Hatteras or along the Atlantic cost or on the Gulf of the approach of storms, and we should not see such items we saw the other day in the papers, that a fleet on seeing the storm-signals immediately took refuge, and six hours thereafter a storm burst which unquestionably would have made a great many wrecks among them unless they had received this notice and taken this refuge. Still it can be cut off if we are so economical that we will not try to make the Government a benefit to the people in matters which are not absolutely required for the existence of the Government itself.

There is another branch of the service which has grown up within a few years that perhaps might be cut off on exactly the same princia few years that perhaps might be cut on on exactly the same principle, but I would not recommend it, and that is the life-saving stations along the Atlantic coast and along the Gulf. I believe they have none on my coast yet, although some exposed points have been legislated for and probably will be provided for during the coming year. Property and life are saved by these means; but the Government can exist without them. They are, however, a benefit to the people. They go right home to the interest of the whole people, and people. They go right home to the interest of the who people, and especially of the maritime classes and of merchants who are importing and exporting goods. They are a protection to commerce and the commercial classes and to our marine, and they ought not to be re-

In just the same way the postal service is a benefit to the people of the United States. Of course it costs the Treasury, it must cost the Treasury something, and unless we put up the postage probably it will increase perhaps not the percentage it costs, but the actual amount of deficiency will be greater year by year. Nevertheless I do not think it ought to be cut off. The deficiency should be greater now than it was ten years ago because we have eight million more people now than we had then, and they are not gathered simply in cities but they have gone out to form new communities of growing Territories and growing States. They are at a distance from the old methods of com-

Unquestionably when the South was cut off by the accidents of war the postal service came nearer being self-supporting than it was before or has been since. I believe that during two or three years of the war it was absolutely self-supporting; but the reason was, that a very large territory in the Southwest less thickly populated than the Northern States was cut off, and we did not need to supply it with postal service; but nevertheless this service needs to be kept up, even if it does cost the Treasury something. A man sits down in his office in Burlington, Vermont, or in New York, or in Massachusetts, and writes a letter directed to Brazos, or directed to Montana; he wants that letter to go; perhaps it is an important communication from him to some person who has charge of his business interests there. Upon the speedy transmission of that letter may depend his interests or sales that he may make of property there, or of merchandise to go there; and consequently it is a benefit to the business of the old part of the country as well as to the new part of the country that communication should be kept up.

With reference to the post-routes in this bill, I have not examined them. I notice in my own State some were put in on my motion though they are not creations of new routes, and I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to that fact. For instance, here is one:

From Guadaloupe, Santa Barbara County, via Lompoc, to the town of Santa Barbara in the same county.

That takes the place of another route somewhat longer. The progress of business, the growing up of towns and especially this town of Lompoc, has built up a community at Lompoc overshadowing anything else in its neighborhood, growing up in the last two years with from a thousand to twelve hundred people. This route is consequently shortened by the provision of this bill, and I have no doubt that that is the case with many of the routes which are here named; that is to say, that the growth of the business requires shorter and more direct routes. They build new wagon-roads in the Territories and new States; they make better modes of communication. The original mail service was sent upon natural routes, such routes as they could find along mountain crests or perhaps through valleys unimproved; and by the progress of settlement and the making of better routes they find shorter ones, and consequently they need that the postal service shall be changed; and the Department is extremely technical in this matter. Unless a route is distinctly named in the statute, although it may be a variation from another, they will not accept the variation, though it may be shorter, because they say they cannot let service to run over a route which is not declared by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but is there any instance in this bill in which any post-route is abolished?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir, in effect. There is the one I mentioned from Guadaloupe to Santa Barbara, in my own State, where a shorter route is established.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly read the clause which stablishes the new route and abolishes the old one?

Mr. SARGENT. It is entirely unnecessary to say so expressly, be-

Mr. SARGENT. It is entriesy unnecessary to say so expressly, because it is always done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, let me—

Mr. SARGENT. I did not report the bill and do not care to be catechised about it. I am stating a fact within my own knowledge. Then I thought the Senator would be willing to Mr. EDMUNDS. be catechised.

Mr. SARGENT. I am stating a fact within my own knowledge and stating it clearly, too clearly to be misunderstood. I stated that this route to which I have reference, which is in the bill at my request, is a substitution in fact of a short route for a long one, cutting off I think some fifteen miles. The two roads run not directly parallel, but within a few miles of each other, the shorter one cutting off elbows, the new route taking the place of the old. My observation in the Post-Office Department is that this is the uniform fact.

There is another fact in reference to this bill. The Post-Office Department rules that there are no post-routes except those that are named in the Revised Statutes or in laws that have been passed since the Revised Statutes; but it was found on examination of the Revised Statutes that many routes which are old, which have been run for years, which are as indispensable as any route in any of the old States, and some of them are in the old States,) were cut off by the Revised Statutes simply because they were not named. The effect of their ruling is to cut off all those routes, and the consequence would be, of course, a very great derangement of public business. My understanding of this bill is that it corrects a great many of these errors in the Revised Statutes. The chairman asserts that the routes which are liable to be cut off for want of being named in the Revised Statutes are replaced in this bill; and consequently the bill ought to pass.

It is entirely optional with the Post-Office Department whether service shall be put on any of these routes which are new. I conserve the property of the put of tend, however, that it is an absolute necessity, and that it is not merely an advantage to the States in the West or Southwest, but it is an advantage to the old States to have their letters carried. Those who live in the old States and in overgrown cities enjoy all the luxury of the Post-Office Department; they can sit at their breakfast-table and have the postman bring their letters at their breakfasts, and their daily papers and their magazines, or any merchandise that may be sent to them by mail—the eggs, if they please, that they eat at the breakfast-table; they can at their lunch-table have the same thing served up to them, and so at their office during the day and at their houses two or three times a day, as regularly as a telegram is sent from the telegraph office. I think they are not the ones to complain and to begrudge the service which is for the benefit of the more sparsely settled States and Territories, where none of these lux-uries are enjoyed. I hold that it is the right of our citizens, wherever they collect into a community—not a mere place for fishing and for hunting, but a community of five hundred or one thousand souls in the new States or Territories-to have rendered to them at least their weekly service. It is the method by which the Government heretofore has treated this matter; it is a wise one; and if it does cost something to the Treasury, it is not more true of it than it is of the Signal-Service, or of the life-saving service, or of the propagation of fishes, or the maintenance of courts, or any of those other matters which are a the maintenance of courts, or any of those other matters which are a charge upon the Treasury and bring no revenue to it whatever.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope we may be allowed, with the consent of the Senator from Indiana, a little while to finish this bill.

Mr. MORTON. If this bill can be disposed of very shortly, say in the course of fifteen or twenty minutes, I shall have no objection; but the other bill has been hanging a good while, and I hope to see it finished.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to take more than one or two min-

Mr. MORTON. I will let this bill go on a little while.

Mr. WINDOM. I merely wish to say that in stating the deficiencies of the Post-Office Department, I think there are two things that should be taken into the account, one of which has not been men-tioned here to-day. The Senator from California mentions the fact tioned here to-day. The Senator from California mentions the fact that the repeal of the franking privilege and the printing of stamps and furnishing them to the Departments makes an apparent additional cost of a million and a half or about that. In addition to that, also, it should be stated, I think, that before the repeal of the franking privilege there was a permanent appropriation of over $700,000, or perhaps exactly that sum, which never entered into the appropriation bill, which never swelled the apparent deficiency at all; so that putting the two items together here are nearly two and a half million dollars of an apparent increase which is no real increase in the service.

So far as the opposition to this present bill is concerned, I think that it is the wrong one to economize on. Perhaps my views of that question may differ somewhat from those of the Senator from Vermont on account of our different positions. If it were not well known that the Senator from Vermont is economical on all occasions, it might possibly be supposed that his zeal in this case for economy was based somewhat on the principles of the individual who during the war was quite willing that all his wife's relations should be drafted. It so turns out that, while every other State of the Union has some post-route in this bill, the State of Vermont has none. I do not suspect that the zeal of the Senator from Vermont has been inspired by that fact; but if it were not well known that he is always for economy, it might possibly be supposed that it was his wife's relations he desired should go to the war rather than his own.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is an error in the bill which I think may be

MR. HAMLIN. There is an error in the bill which I think may be typographical and yet I want to be sure about it. Lines 434, 435, and 436 on page 19 should be transposed. They describe a route in Missouri; it should be a route in Illinois. Those words should be transposed to follow line 191.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The transposition will be made.
Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say one word and only one word in reference to the suggestion of the Senator from California, and that is as to the matter of furnishing stamps for the use of the Government. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads are considering that very subject, and I am happy to say that I concur most cheerfully with the suggestion made by the Senator from California that we with the suggestion made by the Senator from California that we want the use of no Government stamps; that whatever may belong to the Government, whatever they may have to transmit in the mail, should bear the distinguishing mark of the Department from which it goes, and that is all. Then at the end of the year I hold that the Government should make an annual appropriation which would be equivalent to payment for all they have occasion to use the mail service.

My friend from Massachusetts put the question directly to me, if the mail matter of the Government were to be transmitted through the mail matter of the Government were to be transmitted through the mail without stamps, whether it would cost any more; or, in other words, if it adds anything to the mail service. I answer yes, it does. Nine-fifteenths of our service is predicated upon the weight of the mail; consequently nine-fifteenths of that weight would have to be paid for in increased amounts that are paid to your railroads. I think of the other six-fifteenths you would have about the same thing, because the property of the paid to your railroads. cause over any route now performed by coach service the man who makes the bid does inquire as to the amount of mail matter that he will usually have to carry, and he makes the weight of the mail one element of his contract.

I wish to say that we shall at the proper time submit a series of measures for the consideration of the Senate, and if there is that earnestness which is manifested by the Senator from Vermont to correct the existing, I will not say evils, but the existing condition of things in the Department and to bring it back toward being self-sustaining, the Senate shall have measures upon which they can vote to accomplish that result.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Vermont a question before he takes his seat. Do I understand him that the postroute bill or the insertion of a post-route in this bill makes it mandatory upon the Postmaster-General to establish service over that route?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly not.
Mr. SHERMAN. Now I wish to call attention to the fact that the language of the Revised Statutes changes what I always understood to be the established law. I have always understood that inserting a post-route in the post-route bill did not make it mandatory to put any kind of service on it; that it was not to be done unless the Postmaster-General saw proper. The Revised Statutes, as we have them before us, change, in my judgment, that law. I will read the section. In the first place, after making certain railroads and other public lines of communication post-routes, the section says expressly

The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

He is bound under the law therefore to carry the mail over all post-routes, and the only thing left to his discretion is how often. The section is cited as derived from an act of 1872. It certainly is not the law as I understood it to be; and I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to it, so that he may look into it.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is certainly not the practice of the Depart-

Mr. HAMLIN. I will be frank in saying that I was not aware of the phraseology of that section; but they do not give that construction to it at the Department. They give the construction to that law, if that is the one under which they act, that there is a discretion within the Postmaster-General to establish service only upon tion within the Postmaster-General to establish service only upon routes where his judgment shall determine it to be right and proper. Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that is the law; but by the Revised Statutes, which are now the only law on the subject, and which the Postmaster-General, if his attention is called to the subject, is bound to obey, he is bound to put on every post-route service of some kind and for some time; and the only discretion he has is how often. I call attention to it, so that the Senator may in the first postal bill where he thinks it would be proper and pertinent see that it is made right. is made right.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that in my own State I know the practice of the Department is different; because during the past season, in the interest of economy, the Department has withdrawn service altogether on several routes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Still the law is mandatory; and all I want to do is to correct the law according to the practice.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to submit an amendment, to strike out lines 921 and 922, on page 38. The route intended to be established by lines 921 and 922, on page 38, is provided for in lines 903 and 904

Mr. HAMLIN. That is an error of the House. One of them should be stricken out.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to strike out lines 921 and

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amend-ments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 491) granting a pension to Eliza S. Manchester, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1796) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian bark Arctic, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 649) to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

The report was ordered to be printed; and, on motion of Mr. BOUT-WELL, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 563) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof, reported it with amendments.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution for printing 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Orris S. Ferry, late United States Senator from Connecticut, have directed me to report back the same with an amendment. The amendment makes an appropriation, and therefore the form of the concurrent resolution should be altered to a bill, which I will thank the Clerk to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made.

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution calls for a portrait of Mr. Ferry, and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to have it engraved and printed. A previous resolution ordered a portrait of Mr. Wilson in the same way; but there is no appropriation for carrying on the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and the superintendent of that branch of the service is unable to execute the order of Congress unless there be an appropriation, and this makes an appropriation therefor.

In offering this bill I desire to state that the practice of publishing the eulogies on members of Congress, with portraits, has become so well established, that it would be hardly consonant with the feelings of any of the Senators to break from it unless by some general rule applicable to the future; certainly we would not wish to depart from it in the case of Mr. Ferry, a man for whom we all had the highest admiration and respect. I understand there will be another proposition like this coming from the other House, and after that it is the opinion of the committee that the practice should be abandoned. It was abandoned some ten or twelve years ago, but has been gradually resumed.

Mr. STEVENSON. How long has it been the practice? I have known cases since I have been in the Senate where it has not been

Mr. ANTHONY. It was the practice when I first came to the Sen-

Mr. ANTHONY. It was the practice when I first came to the Senate, and was soon after abandoned; but it has been resumed in the last seven or eight years, so that the practice is now pretty uniform.

Mr. STEVENSON. Several cases have occurred in the Senate since I have been here. I can understand an exception in the case of a President or Vice-President of the United States; perhaps that might properly be regarded as an exception; but I had supposed the rule had not been re-established of printing portraits of deceased Sena-

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a portrait of Mr. Sumner and a portrait of Mr. Fessenden, and we all supposed the Senate would not like to omit any mark of respect to Mr. Ferry which had been shown to those who had preceded him. It was so in Mr. Buckingham's case

Mr. STEVENSON. When my late colleague, Mr. Garrett Davis, died, there was no portrait of him published, and I was informed that the custom had been abandoned.

Mr. INGALLS. Does this contemplate the engraving of a new

Mr. ANTHONY. Engraving a new plate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will at once introduce a resolution that hereafter, so that it may not apply to any case which has occurred, this habit of publishing obituary notices of this kind shall be discontinued. It is growing into an abuse. It was abandoned at one time, as I remember very well; I think a resolution was passed, or at all events an agreement was come to, that we would not publish such notices in this form, but let them go into the Congressional Record in the permanent record of our proceedings. It seems to me the practice of publishing of 12,000 copies of eulogies on a Senator ought to be discontinued. After this case has passed, we ought rigidly to adhere to the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. And there is one other case of a member of the House, who is already deceased, in whose case a resolution will probably come over.

Mr. SHERMAN. As to those who may die hereafter we ought to agree.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the practice to which the Senator from Kentucky refers was resumed in the case of Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, as to printing eulogies, and has been continued ever since.

The bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on announcement of the death of Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, was read three times, and passed.

HARVEY & LIVESEY.

Mr. HOWE. The other day I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the report of the Committee on Claims upon the petition of Harvey & Livesey, praying compensation for labor, materials, and damage under contract for masonry-work to piers and abutments for bridge at Rock Island, June 1, 1869. I ask now that the Senate will agree to that reconsideration, and ask now that the Senate will agree to that reconsideration, and recommit the petition to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from West Virginia who, I believe, made the report makes no objection to the recommittal.

Mr. CAPERTON. No, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I spoke to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WRIGHT. Perhaps there is no fair objection.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 645) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles M. McCord; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 646) to regulate the practice in circuit courts upon decrees of final injunction in patent cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 647) for the more effectual prevention of cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 648) to provide for changes in alleys in the city of Washington by assent of parties interested; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. I introduce the bill by request. I am not advised of the merits of the bill, but I move to have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF A JUDGE.

I ask unanimous consent, before taking up the Mr. EDMUNDS. special order, to call up the bill providing for the relief of the judge of the western district of Pennsylvania. It is a bill that will excite, I suppose, no discussion, and the public interest seems to require that this judge should be allowed to resign at the earliest moment possible, as he is incapacitated for business.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It extends the provisions of section 714 of the Revised Statutes to Hon. Wilson McCandless, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, in consequence of his physical disability, notwithstanding he has not attained the age of seventy years.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by adding the following:

Provided, That said McCandless shall resign his office within six months next after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the words "the honorable."
That term is never inserted in bills. This gentleman is an honorable

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 192) authorizing the sale of certain lands in Vin-

A bill (H. R. No. 361) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory;
A bill (H. R. No. 1816) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; A bill (H. R. No. 1297) prohibiting the cutting of timber on any Indian reservation or lands to which the Indian title or right of occupancy has not been extinguished, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2121) to authorize commissioned officers of the Army to make deposits under the act of May 15, 1872; and A bill (H. R. No. 2821) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 810) agreement to the amendments of the Senate to the oill (H. R. No. 310) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Robert Hamilton of New Jersey, Mr. Samuel J. Randall of Pennsylvania, and Mr. William A. Wheeler of New York managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum, in the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore

FIRST TROOP, PHILADELPHIA CITY CAVALRY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the Senate to take up a House bill, which will take but a moment. It is the bill (H. R. No. 2012) to authorize the sale of certain ordnance stores to the First Troop, Philadelphia City Cavalry. I will read the bill, and I think there will be no objection to it. It provides:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell to the First Troop, Philadelphia City Cavalry, at the cost price thereof to the United States one hundred new Springfield carbines, caliber forty-five hundredths, with such acconterments, equipments, and ammunition for the same as may be required, the money received therefor to be passed on the books of the Treasury to the current appropriations for the Ordnance Department of the Army.

I will say that the First City Troop of Philadelphia was organized in the early part of the Revolution and has existed ever since. It in the early part of the Revolution and has existed ever since. It was the body-guard of General Washington and was with him in his fights in the Jerseys. It has been kept up continually, and the city of Philadelphia has great pride in it. It was originally composed of the most distinguished men of that city, and the desire has been ever since to make every one of its members worthy to fill a much higher place than he does in the company. They are all gentlemen. They never interfere with anybody, but do their duty faithfully. At the beginning of the Morian war, they are their contains beginning of the Mexican war they sent their captain out with a company to Mexico. At the beginning of the last war the company volunteered to serve a couple of months on the Virginia border, and ou all occasions they are always ready to do that which a gentleman will do, his duty and more than his duty. They ask for no favor. They propose to pay the price these arms cost the Government and turn the money in before they get the carbines.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to make any contest about the bill, but I suggest that I do not think it has been considered by the Military Committee. I do not know but that there may be great merit in it; but I think it ought to be looked into, because there has been an application made for arms to be furnished to various companies in Charleston, South Carolina, and divers and sundry companies all over the country, and in the Military Committee these applications have had some consideration and we have been inclined to think that the arms furnished to the different States on the requisition of the governor were sufficient and that we could not set the precedent allowing arms to be given out in this way. This is a different case; it is for a sale of the arms; but the same request may be made by a great many persons all over the country in order to get arms very cheap. It strikes me it is a matter that had better be considered by the com-

It strikes me it is a matter than the mittee. It think the bill ought to go to the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to its going to the committee, but it seems to me that this would perhaps be a good precedent. It is the only case where any company or association of persons have offered to pay for what they get. These gentlemen will pay the full cost of the carbines and pay the cost of their transportation from the arsenal to Philadelphia, and I think it would be a good precedent to set before other people who come and ask for arms, for precedent to set before other people who come and ask for arms, for then we could say "This company here got arms, to be sure, but they have paid for them, and if you will do so we will allow you the same

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that I have any opposition to the bill, but I would rather that it should go to the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then I will not persist.

Mr. THURMAN. It occurs to me that all the security we want is that the arms should be kept in this country to be used by our own citizens. If they are kept for that purpose, we know very well that Springfield muskets or Springfield rifles will not be used against us, but they will be kept for the use of the militia of the United States, in whose hands they will be when they are wanted. Therefore, where there is no danger of the arms being made a matter of merchandise and sold abroad, where they are to remain in the hands of our own citizens, I do not see any objection to our furnishing all that anybody will buy. That is the way it strikes me. These arms will certainly be in the hands of honorable gentlemen who will keep them for the purpose for which they receive them and not make merchandise of them. I really do not see any necessity for us committing the bill, and no reason why it should not pass at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to referring the

Mr. LOGAN. I made no objection to the bill, but I must certainly disagree with my friend from Ohio. If the Government of the United States once engages in the business of making arms for the citizens, I only say it is a new business. We shall have to keep a great many officers engaged in the business at a considerable salary. The salaries of the officers and employés are not considered in making out the cost, nor are the buildings and machinery. So far as the principle is concerned I differ with the Senator from Ohio. I think it is entirely incorrect, and that we ought not to manufacture arms for the purpose neorrect, and that we ought not to manufacture arms for the purpose of selling them at cost price. If we do, we go to great expense without any benefit derived by the Government whatever.

But I am not saying this in opposition to the bill. The bill may be the proper thing to do under the circumstance, and I make no opposition; I merely ask its reference that it may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs if there be no objection.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon, the pending question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President—

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg to ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield the floor for a few moments. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was ordered to a third reading, with a view to offer an amendment. to offer an amendment.

Mr. MORTON. If I understand the purpose the Senator from Rhode Island has in view, he proposes to offer an amendment. It cannot be done without a reconsideration; but, as the bill has been pending before the Senate for a long time, I suggest to the Senator that he have his amendment read for information, and he can speak to it in the present condition of the bill, and let the vote on reconsideration then be the test on his amendment. That will answer his purpose.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am quite willing to take that course.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the motion of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island will prevail. I was not aware that the bill had passed to a third reading. I had intended to offer in the Senate the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Coopers] the vote appear.

ment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] the vote upon which was taken in his and my temporary absence from the Senate. Unexpectedly the vote was reached and taken, and I did desire to submit to the Senate a few remarks in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. Now, as the bill has passed to a third reading, unless the reconsideration is ordered by the Senate, we shall be excluded from offering amendments; and yet I did desire that that amendment should be voted upon by a fuller Senate than those who amendment should be voted upon by a fuller Senate than those who were present at the time the vote was reached. I trust, therefore, understanding the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to be for the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill passed to a third reading, it will prevail, and that no objection will be offered to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MORTON. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The motion to order the bill to a third reading is reconsidered, and the bill is now onen to amendment.

s now open to amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I now offer my amendment. There is a misprint; the amendment is intended to take the place of the second section of the bill instead of the third as printed.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which is to strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof-

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, he shall immediately make a report thereof to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who shall at once cause the said Supreme Court to proceed to examine as to who are the legal electors of said State, and shall have power to send for persons and papers; and the said Chief Justice shall, on or before the last Tuesday in January next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, report to the President of the Senate which of the said electors were legally elected; and the returns sent by the electors so designated shall, if in all other respects they are legal, be counted before the two Houses.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, it was my intention to offer an amendment covering the points embraced in the remarks I submitted the day before yesterday; but, inasmuch as a constitutional amendment will doubtless be adopted before the presidential election of 1880, I have decided to confine my amendment to the case of two sets of returns from the same State.

I am aware that there may be a supposed constitutional objection to this, but I think in an emergency like this, if it is possible for Con-gress to give the Constitution a liberal construction which will enable us to avoid the discord that may arise from double sets of returns from any single State at the next election, we ought to do it. Take, for instance, the case of Louisiana. If the electoral votes should be so equally divided as to make the return from that State decide the election, it is clear to me, and must be clear to every Senator here, that the two Houses would disagree upon that subject. It is clear to me that the present House of Representatives, the same House which is to act when we count the electoral votes at the next presidential election, would declare the McEnery government the legal government of the State of Louisiana. We all know that the Senate would declare the Kellogg government the legal government because it has already passed a resolution to that effect.

Now, Mr. President, is it at all reasonable to suppose that either party would be satisfied with the result in such a case when the electoral votes are counted next February? Does any Senator believe that there would not be great discord in the country if that state of affairs should arise? Yet under this bill it may arise. be the duty of Congress to pass some law or make some joint rule that will avert the difficulty.

The objection that my amendment is not constitutional does not strike me with the same force that it does many of the Senators with whom I have talked. I do not consider this a judicial question; I do not consider it a "case" within the meaning of the Constitution. It is simply a call from Congress on the Supreme Court to perform the reasonable duty of instructing them as to which is the legal Government and which set of electors were legally elected in a State. If it is a "case" at all, it is a "case" in which a State is interested, and therefore the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction.

I may say many things that seem absurd to the legal gentlemen in the Senate; but I am striving to get at some practical means of avoiding a very serious difficulty which may arise at the counting of the next electoral votes. If we cannot refer this question directly to the Supreme Court as a court, can we not refer it to it as a board of arbitration? Can they not resolve themselves into such a board for the time being? Is it not their duty as citizens of the United States and as officers of the United States and officers of the highest court of the land, one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, to perform this work for Congress?

It is clear to me, and must be clear to the mind of every Senator here, that the people of the United States would bow to a decision of that kind without complaint. They are accustomed to regard the decisions of the Supreme Court as of great authority; they are accustomed to respect them, whether they are for or against them. There is no mode I can think of that would give such universal satisfaction to the whole people.

Another thing is very clear to me, that it was never the intention of the framers of the Constitution to make Congress the judge of the qualifications of the electors. If it had been so, the Constitution would have distinctly stated it. It makes each House the judge of the qualifications of its own members in express terms, but it does not imply even that Congress has any right to judge of the qualifications of the electors.

The framers of the Constitution probably never expected a difficulty of the kind we are discussing would arise. It is an unforeseen trouble which is presented to us, and we as representatives of the people are bound to grapple it in such a way as to avoid discord and danger.

bound to grapple it in such a way as to avoid discord and danger.

I offer this amendment in the best possible spirit. If it does not prevail, I shall vote for the bill as it stands; but I see a gap, and a very wide one, which in my opinion should be filled. I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] that, as it stands, with the exception of creating a method by which we can have an orderly meeting of the two Houses in case the returns are all regular, there is very little in it.

I am much obliged to the Senator from Connecticut for yielding me the floor.

Mr. EATON. I had supposed, Mr. President, that all amendments that were to be offered to the bill had been offered and disposed of; but now comes in this new amendment, and before I proceed to the discussion of the bill, I will say a word or two in regard to the amendment which has been offered by my distinguished friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

In my view of the Constitution of the United States it is not competent for Congress to legislate on this subject, to throw into any other Department of Government, or to give to any other man in the world or to any other set of men in the world the power to decide this question. By the terms of the Constitution of the United States it belongs to the Congress of the United States to decide—to no other power, no other body, no other man. I beg leave to suggest to my distinguished friend that by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, passed by two-thirds of each House of Congress and ratified by three-fourths of the States of the Union, he could arrive at the terms of his proposition, and, in my judgment, in no other manner. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote against that amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. With the permission of the Senator from Connecticut I will offer now an amendment, the amendment originally proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the second section it is proposed

And that if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from Delaware I have no question as to the constitutionality of. If the House and Senate see fit to legislate on this question, it is competent for them to adopt an amendment of that character in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, as I understand that instrument. Objection was made the other day to this amendment, or one of a similar character, by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] because it gave to the States too much power; because it gave to the small States a power which they ought not to have under our Government. With all that argument I take issue. I shall not vote for this amendment; but the argument against it in that regard, in my judgment, is not sound. Sir, by the terms of the Constitution of the United States, under certain circumstances the States hold that power, and I know of no reason why Connecticut and Delaware and New Hampshire and Massachusetts, States belonging to the old thirteen, should not exercise the same power with Indiana and Ohio and Missouri, children of the old thirteen. But I do not care to follow that line of argument, because I intend to vote against the amendment.

As I said yesterday, so I again say to-day, that the remarks which I shall submit to the Senate will not be in any degree tinctured by an exhibition of party feeling. My views of the importance of the subject, for upon it rests the peace of the whole Federal Union, the peace and well-being of the entire people of this broad land, I trust peace and well-being of the entire people of this broad land, I trust will prevent from allowing any partisan feeling to appear.

It may not be unimportant to allude to the great contest in 1801, which contest discovered to the people of the Union that there was a great and lamentable defect in the Constitution of the United States. By the very means of that defect in the Constitution, the wishes of a large majority of the people of the United States came very near being defeated; an individual came very near being elected President of the United States who did not receive in fact one single vote within the limits of the Union for that high office. Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr were the candidates of the then republican party for the offices of President and Vice-President. They received an equal number of votes, and by the terms of the Constitution as originally framed neither of them was elected President because a majority was necessary in order to constitute either of them President of the United States, and so the election was devolved on the House of Representatives. For many days a great contest went on; public feeling was aroused all over the country; but I am happy to be able to say here in 1876 that there were in 1801 honest public men, as I believe there are in 1876 honest public men. There were on that occasion men who trod under foot their political views, and one of them, a distinguished Representative from Delaware, the grandfather of one of our own number, a federalist of great renown, did not press the vote of his State, and thus Mr. Jefferson was elected to the office that the people designed him for. There were then, as there are today, public men in whom the people had confidence without regard to their political opinions. Mr. Jefferson was elected. Mr. Burr, of course, by the terms of the Constitution was elected to the second office. An amendment to the Constitution was necessary that there might not again be a difficulty of that character. The Constitution was anended, and from that day to 1865 the Constitution answered a proper and a beneficent purpose. In 1865 a little tinkering was thought necessary to be done and legislative action was had upon this very subject, and perhaps in another part of my remarks I may say more in regard to the unwiseness, the absurdity, the foolishness of that action. I take occasion now to say that we had better not again be guilty of any such absurdity or foolishness of that character.

Sir, there are two questions which each Senator ought to answer to himself. First, have we the power to legislate on this subject? Under a clause of the Constitution, I have no doubt that where the instrument is not plain in its terms, where its implied powers are not thoroughly understood and agreed upon, it is within the province of Congress to legislate upon the subject. Therefore in my judgment, as in the opinion of other Senators, legislation may be had when necessary to carry out the implied powers of the Constitution; but I desire to impress it upon every Senator in this body that all such legislation should be avoided, if possible. It is a dangerous power to exercise even when you possess it under the Constitution.

It becomes necessary, Mr. President, that we should look at the Constitution, because the second question to which I address myself is this: Is there any necessity for legislation? I desire to call the attention of the Senate in this connection to a clause in the Constitution which has before been read:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

"The President of the Senate shall open all the certificates." That is his duty; that devolves upon him by the Constitution of the United States; and there is the end of his duty. So far as the Constitution is concerned, he opens the certificates, "and the votes shall then be counted." The duties of the President of the Senate or of the Vice-President of the United States are defined by the Constitution. There are other duties, and I shall have occasion, if timeserves me, to speak at length upon the duties which devolve upon the Senate and House of Representatives; but right here I desire to speak of the operation of that law, that constitutional law, as it sufficed to carry this people from 1801 to 1865. For more than sixty years the people of the United States went on and elected their electors of President and Vice-President; the certificates were sent to the Vice-President of the United States, the presiding officer of the Senate, and there never was any trouble, there never was any difficulty, there never was even (and that is the trouble we find to-day) discussion enough upon that very clause of the Constitution for the lawyers of the land to form their opinions; and we come now to the discussion of that question to-day, when, in my judgment, it has not ever been thoroughly discussed before, because there has been no necessity for the discussion.

But, sir, in 1865—and why I do not know; why I cannot conceive; why I have never heard anybody say—honorable gentlemen, acting under doubtless a high sense of duty, passed a certain rule which was called the twenty-second joint rule. Why they passed it nobody has ventured here to say; perhaps I shall learn by and by. There never had been any difficulty under the Constitution. Right in the throes of war, with a Vice-President occupying the seat which you honor and dignify, sir, of secession sympathies, a candidate himself for the high office of President of the United States, the certificates of the electors were opened according to law, and Lincoln and Hamlin were declared President and Vice-President of the United States. Why the necessity, then, for any such rule as the twenty-second joint rule? When the country was on the very verge of the most destructive civil war ever known to man, this instrument, this Constitution of the United States, controlled, and the personal honor, the personal integrity, of the then Vice-President of the United States forbade him not to do his whole duty, his full duty. Sir, I thank God I have not lost all confidence in the personal honor and the personal integrity of man. Then why was the twenty-second joint rule adopted? I will not

Then why was the twenty-second joint rule adopted? I will not undertake to say that it was adopted for the very purpose of disfranchising a people, but I say it has had the effect. But no matter why, the very fathers of it disown the child. It is no longer the rule. It is repealed. Now, sir, where does the repeal of that rule leave us? That is the question. One good thing was done when the rule was repealed; but where does that leave us? The repeal of that rule leaves us exactly where we were before the rule was passed. The Constitution of the United States is now the governing power of the Senate and House of Representatives with regard to the election certificates of which I have spoken. The action of the Congress of the United States, or, if gentlemen desire to be technical, the action of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, under this clause of the Constitution was for seventy years honest, honorable, upright, just. What business has any man to suppose that it is going to be dishonest and corrupt hereafter? Sir, it is an old saying, and perhaps smacks somewhat of a vulgar saying, to speak well of a bridge that carries you safely over. Now, with this clause of the Constitution which has carried us along for three-quarters of a century why should we find fault to-day?

We are told that it is a dangerous power to be intrusted to a single man, and he a possible candidate. There never was a cause in the world so weak but what its advocates could find reasons, poor ones, not world so weak but what its advocates could find reasons, poor ones, not infrequently; but one of the reasons that have been most harped upon here is that this is a dangerous power to place in the hands of one man. Sir, is this question properly understood? I said some minutes ago that the question had not yet been thoroughly discussed by the legal talent of the United States; it has been discussed, but not thoroughly. Does it rest with one man? Not in my judgment would the exercise of the power be dangerous if it did, but I will speak of that in another place; but does it rest with one man? I say no sir a thousand other place; but does it rest with one man? I say no, sir, a thousand times, no; it does not rest with one man. But suppose it does; let us for one moment consider the question from that stand-point. states or the President pro tempore of the Senate. For seventy-five years it has been properly exercised. We have been told on the floor of the Senate that six times within the last seventy-five years Vice-Presidents who have been candidates for re-election or for the Presidency have exercised this power. Six times in the last seventy-five years have candidates exercised this power; and yet the stars have not fallen, no injury has been done to any of the people of this land, and why beg a fight now? Why insist upon it that there is to be corruption hereafter.

Mr. President, one would suppose, I have been almost induced to suppose, that honorable Senators here gravely fear, assuming that the power is in the hands of the President of the Senate, that time in February next the President of the Senate, that some time in February next the President of the Senate of the United States will degrade his character and dishonor his high place. Sir, I do not fear it. I deny the power. I say, and shall endeavor to show before I get through, that it is somewhere else; but, assuming the power to be in the Vice-President of the United States, I do not fear it.

But now what is the true intendment of the Constitution? I desire to say, and particularly to my honorable friend from Indiana-for I know his ability and the power with which he grapples with constitutional questions—that for more than sixty years no question was ever raised; and there is the trouble with this whole matter to-day. The votes were opened, the certificates were counted, the elec-wait until after the trouble does occur?

Mr. EATON. No. Mr. MORTON. I call my friend's attention to the fact that in 1857 in the counting of the votes a question arose which happened to be unimportant because it did not change the result. It was in regard to the counting of the vote of Wisconsin; but the danger that the nation passed through at that time, and avoided simply by the fact that the vote was not important to the final result, was such as to fill every member of both Houses of Congress with alarm, as is shown by the debate that subsequently occurred. Had the result of that election depended on the vote of Wisconsin nobody can tell what might have happened.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Indiana reads me rightly; I do not wish the horse to be stolen before a lock is put upon the stable door. I do not intend that it shall be stolen. I simply desire to say that in my judgment this question has not yet been thoroughly discussed; I hope it will be by my honorable friend from Indiana b fore the debate closes upon this bill. In the minds of many men whose opinions are deserving of great respect, among them the honorable Senator from Indiana and my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN, ] the time has arrived when something ought to be done.

THURMAN,] the time has arrived when something ought to be done. Now, Mr. President, I desire again to look at the clause in the Constitution: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." By whom? I insist, and I assert without fear of successful contradiction, giving due weight to the argument of my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. Merrinon] made yesterday, that the votes are counted by the Senate and the House of Representatives, and not by the Vice-President or the presiding officer of the Senate. In my judgment, the Vice-President is the organ of the two Houses, and nothing else. It has never been my fortune, whether good or ill, to be present there as an actor or a spectator when the yotes have been counted for President and Vice-President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me, he says the presiding officer of the Senate is the organ of Cengress. I wish to pro-pound this question: Is it competent, if the two Houses of Congress e proper, to appoint some other organ for Congress to make known its will, or whether he considers that under the Constitution the President of the Senate is made the organ of the two Houses?

Mr. EATON. Of course he is. It is said by the Constitution that he shall be.

Mr. SAULSBURY. To count?

Mr. EATON. No, to open. Will my friend state the question

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understood the Senator to say that the President of the Senate was the organ of the two Houses for the purpose of counting. I do not know whether I understood him correctly. Then I follow the precedent. It has been the practice, I understand, that he does open and announce the vote. I ask the Senator if he thinks it competent for the two Houses of Congress, when assembled, to appoint some other organ for the purpose of counting the votes?

Mr. EATON. They do now. They do it every time they meet.

They always do it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator allow me?
Mr. EATON. Certainly, but I would like to answer one first. The Constitution of the United States points out who shall open the certificates. The two Houses appoint counters now. Who are counters?
The tellers. Who appoints them? The Senate appoints its teller and the House of Representatives appoints itstellers. Am I wrong? I suppose I am entirely right. The misunderstanding of my distinguished friend from Delaware consisted in this: I said that the President of the Senate was the organ of the two Houses for a certain purpose; he is the organ of the Constitution to open the votes; he is the organ of the two Houses to declare the result after the two Houses have counted. There is no doubt about it in my mind; it is as clear as God's sun. Let me read. For another purpose, I sent for the Globe of 1860-761, and I will read from page 894. I think I am entirely right. The manner of going into the House, &c., I will not read:

The Vice-President took his seat on the right of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and presided over the joint convention of the two Houses. The members of the Senate occupied seats provided for them in the area of the hall.

Mr. Trumbull, the teller appointed on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. Phelps and Washburne of Illinois, the two tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their seats at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Tellers appointed by the President or by the

Mr. EATON. I have said by the Senate or by the House. "The teller appointed on the part of the Senate" is the language and "the two tellers appointed on the part of the House." I have been informed, I will say to my friend from Virginia, by a member of this body who has acted as a teller in the other House, that he was appointed by the House, and the Senate appointed its teller.

The VICE-PRESIDENT then said :-

And this is important-

"The two Houses being assembled, in pursuance of the Constitution, that the votes may be counted and declared for President and Vice-President of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1861, it becomes my duty, under the Constitution, to open the certificates of election in the presence of the two Houses of Congress. I now proceed to discharge that duty."

That is all he had.

The Vice-President then proceeded to open and hand to the tellers the votes of the several States for President and Vice-President of the United States, commencing with the State of Maine.

The votes having been opened and counted, the tellers, through Mr. Trumbull, reported the following as the result of the count.

And then follows the result.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When was that?

Mr. JOHNSTON. When was that?
Mr. EATON. February, 1861. Now ir, what can be clearer to the mind of any constitutional lawyer than that the duty of the Vice-President is to open the certificates? They are sent to him; he is their custodian. On a certain day he meets the two Houses together in joint convention. He, their presiding officer, opens the certificates; and the Senate and the House of Representatives, through their tellers. tellers, count; not he. Sir, I have no doubt on this subject. the entire duty of the presiding officer of the Senate; not that, if I am wrong and it is his duty to count, I fear that he will not discharge his duty. I am talking now about what I believe the law is, the organic law of the land. Take the other view of this case. What are we, if we should live until the time arrives, and what are the members the House of Representatives? Witnesses of a pageant; that is all. According to the theory of my friend from Indiana, and I believe also According to the theory of my friend from Indiana, and I believe also of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, we are simply witnesses of propose to meet this whole question, I will suppose that we are in joint convention next February. Our distinguished friend, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who, I take the liberty to say, has been exceptionally fair as Presiding Officer of the Senate, is the presiding officer of that joint convention. Two returns come up from the same State, I will say my own State. I do not know well how anybody can steal I will say my own State. I do not know well how anybody can stear the seal of the "nutmeg" State and get two returns here; but I will the seal of the "nutmeg" State and get two returns here; but I will supsuppose that two returns do come up from Connecticut. I will suppose that, not the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. Conk-LING, [Gr he might not like to count on that occasion,) but my good friend the Senator from Massachusetts nearest me [Mr. Boutwell] friend the Senator from Massachusetts nearest me [Mr. Boutwell] is the teller appointed by the Senate. Two tellers have been appointed by the House of Representatives. What is it the duty of the honorable President of the Senate to do? Here are two returns from the State of Connecticut. Does he count them? No, a thousand times no. He has no warrant for it. There is no warrant in the Constitution; there is no warrant in practice for it. What does he do with those two returns? He passes them over to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, our teller, and the two honorable iellers from the House of Representatives and those three men, count and determine the House of Representatives and those three men, count and determine the House of Representatives and those three men, count and determine the House of Representatives. the House of Representatives, and those three men count and determine the matter.

I will go further. Suppose that there are two returns from the State of Connecticut, both, for the purposes of this argument, with the great seal of the State attached. It has been known for months that there were two such returns. Everybody has known it. It has been canvassed through the public press. There is not a member of the Senate nor a member of the House of Representatives who is not thoroughly informed with regard to those two returns and all the antecedents of those two returns. Do not let us blink this question. It is known that one of them is a bare, open fraud. One is the valid one; the other is the fraudulent one. The Senate know it; the House of Representatives know it. Suppose, for the purposes of the argument, that there is a supple tool in the Chair, not you, sir, as President of the Senate. Suppose he assumes to count, against the President of the Senate. Suppose he assumes to count, against the Constitution and against all practice under the Constitution, the well-known and absolutely false return. He never would count it in the world. He could not count it before the Senate and the Repthe world. He could not count it before the Senate and the Representatives of forty millions of people. Instantly a motion would be made by somebody, my friend from Vermont, or my friend from Indiana, and if by nobody else I would make it. This question would be tried, tried there, and properly tried. Then the joint convention would determine which was the true return; and, after the joint convention had spoken, the world would be satisfied. I say that, after the joint convention of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States speaks authoritatively with regard to the return from any State, the world will be satisfied.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question at this point? Could this joint convention determine it acting as one body, each Senator and each Representative having one vote?

body, each Senator and each Representative having one vote

Mr. EATON. Undoubtedly. Under my view, it is decided by a majority vote of the convention. I am very well aware that the Constitution does not expressly say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Does not the Constitution provide that the two Houses shall separate? Mr. EATON. On thi

Mr. EATON. On this point?
Mr. JOHNSTON. On any question.
Mr. EATON. I do not know; but I would like my distinguished friend to point it out to me.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It applies to all questions that come before that

Mr. EATON. It applies to this, I admit. I do not see the point, and there is not any, in my judgment. I assume that it is a joint convention; because everybody else for three-quarters of a century has assumed the same thing.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?
Mr. EATON. Certainly.
Mr. WHYTE. I ask if that very question did not come up in 1857; whether Mr. Mason did not walk out with the Senate, without having whether Mr. Mason did not walk out with the Senate, without having any vote in the body at all?

Mr. MORTON. Held it was not in order to make any motion.

Mr. WHYTE. Refused to hear any proposition.

Mr. EATON. Then all I have to say about it is that he did not do his duty. That is all there is about that. The question was a new one. It will not be new next February. We are now discussing that question, and this is the time to discuss it.

Mr. SARGENT. Will not that be a precedent?

Mr. EATON. It will be; but, to use a common expression, "that skimmer will not hold water," in my judgment. It is a joint convention. I have not time to go back and find, but I presume that the very Globe in which the account is printed calls it a joint convention. If 1 am right, (and I have no doubt about it,) the vote of every State in this Union will be counted next February; there will be no disen-franchising of the people of a State. The question will be opened and settled and passed on, not by any act of Congress, not by any legislative tinkering upon the Constitution, but by the great govern-ing power of the land, the Constitution itself.

Sir, I should be glad, if time would serve, to discuss at greater length my construction of this clause in the Constitution; but time Is there any danger to be apprehended to the country that is the point that I desire to be calmly considered by every Sentator—is there any danger to be apprehended to the country, to its institutions, to the welfare of our people by this construction of the Constitution? Why, sir, the great right of the people is preserved intact, the right to have the certificates opened and counted and the result declared.

There is another point. A friend might say to me from the other There is another point. A friend might say to me from the other side of the Chamber, "There is an objection to this construction of the Constitution, because a party majority would rule." That is true. Party majorities rule everywhere. I recognize the objection and its force; but let the construction of the Constitution be final; let us know what the law is forever. Parties change, but let the Constitution not be changed. This objection comes and must always come under this form of government of ours. Party comes in everywhere.
The very amendment that has been offered to-day in good faith by The very amendment that has been offered to-day in good faith by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island gives to a party man the decision of this question. There is nobody in the United States that is worth having, there is nobody in the United States that can decide the question intelligently that is not in some way connected with some party organization. Of necessity he will not be a partisan in the decision of this question. God forbid! If you should give to the Supreme Court, if you could, the right to decide a question of this magnitude, while Ishould know that a majority of them belonged to a party different from the one to which I was attached, yet I should believe and expect that their decision would be honorable, just, and puriciply. We shall all agree upon one thing: no matter what we do believe and expect that their decision would be honorable, just, and upright. We shall all agree upon one thing: no matter what we do, no matter what construction we give to the Constitution, no matter what law of Congress you may pass in order to carry out the principles of the instrument, something must be left to human integrity, something must be left to man's honor, and I thank God for it.

One objection that I have to giving this power to any other body than the two Houses is, because the Constitution lodges it with us. We are forced by the Constitution not to shirk the duty but to perform it and Lack horarable Senators have you not confidence in it, and I ask honorable Senators, have you not confidence in your own integrity?

Mr. President, I have discussed this question at some length, but let me suppose that I am entirely wrong—it is very possible that I may be—let me suppose that under the Constitution the power is vested, not as I claim it to be vested in the Senate and House of Repvested, not as I claim it to be vested in the Senate and House of Representatives, but in the Vice-President of the United States or the President of the Senate, as the case may be. If it be so, in God's name let it rest there. I thank God I have left in me some confidence in human nature. While I do not desire to say an improper thing in this high body, I have to say this, and I feel I have a right to say it: There is no Vice-President of the United States; there is a President of the Senate, and in that President of the Senate I have entire confidence. Therefore I say that if I am wrong in my construction left. fidence. Therefore I say that if I am wrong in my construction, let us have no legislation, and let this power rest where our fathers placed it.

Again, by a decision of the Senate the power is claimed—and I will not undertake to say wrongfully—that they have the right daily or hourly or fifteenminutely to make a new presiding officer of the Senate. If that is suggested as an objection, I have to say that I have confidence in the American Senate. I do not believe a majority of the American Senate would place a man in that chair to disgrace common humanity and cast a blot upon the fair fame of the United States. mon humanity and cast a blot upon the fair fame of the United States. I have no fear, I will not have any fear, on that subject. If my view and construction of the Constitution is wrong and that taken by others is right, whoever occupies that chair in February Lext will have the proud honor of declaring and announcing the future President and Vice-President of the United States; and, sir, he will do it honestly. With the eyes of the Senate and House of Representatives, with the eyes of feetir williams of feet people with the eyes of the whole sirilized of forty millions of free people, with the eyes of the whole civilized world upon him, he cannot disgrace himself. Whatever other men may think, I will not believe that integrity is a myth, I will not believe that our form of government has become a mockery all over the civilized world.

Mr. President, believing as I do that the power is ample now, I have voted steadily, as I said yesterday, against every amendment to this bill, and I shall vote against the bill itself for the reasons that I have given, and for the further reason that the second section of the bill is a bid for fraud—open, unmitigated fraud; not that my distinguished and honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and my equally distinguished and honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] so intend it; God forbid. They cannot think that I charge them with anything wrong; but I say the second section of the bill is a bid for designing men under it to defraud the people of their rights. Let every Senator read it; that very section tells men all over this Union how to get up a set of returns, to bring them here, and to destroy and disfranchise the vote of a State. Therefore I will vote against the bill.

No legislation, in my judgment, is required. That Constitution under which we have lived, that clause under which we have acted for nearly three-quarters of a century is all we require to-day, no matter how it is construed, either my way or the other way. If anything is required, it is an amendment to the Constitution itself, and not legislation. If I could become convinced that there was any necessity for an amendment to the Constitution, then I would unite with my friend from Indiana in the purpose of framing such an amendment as would in our judgment answer for the people in the future; but no legislation upon this matter is required, especially no legislation under which one, two, three, or four States may be disfranchised. Let us go on as our fathers did; let us go on under this clause in the Constitution; and, my word for it, the spirit which comes before the eyes of the distinguished Senators from Indiana and Ohio will down, down, at the bidding of the President of this Senate when the votes are counted next for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the debate that has taken place in the Senate upon this grave and important subject, is a very strong proof of the want of direct provision in the Constitution in relation to this question of the count of electoral votes. It is seldom that so many views so diverse have been expressed in relation to a matter that should seem so simple in itself. At the election that shall have been held before the body of the American people, they will have expressed their will in regard to their candidates, and it would simply seem that nothing more was left than a declaration of results which had already been completed. From the foundation of this Government up to 1872 there had been one remarkable feature, the complete acquiescence at all times and under all circumstances of the people in every State with the result of the election for electors for President and Vice-President. Such a thing as an attempt to contest the election of the presidential electors never was known in our history until 1872. Such a thing as a double return of electoral votes from any State never had been heard of until the evil case and shocking precedent of Louisiana in 1872.

It seems to me that, in considering a question like this, a very grave and important lesson may be learned by us all. If there be a dishonest disposition, it will find some way or other a pretext for its exhibition and gratification. If there be a will, a way will be found for it; and if the disposition fraudulently to escape from the popular verdict does exist and dares to exhibit itself before the people of America, before one of their chief executive officers in the presence of the two Houses chosen by those people as their representatives, and shall not be withered and blasted in the attempt, then it will be a proof that the spirit that made this Government possible, that alone can make it permanent, has died out in the hearts of the American people. This Government of ours, frame it as we may, legislate upon it as we please, was meant, and meant only, for an honorable, a virtuous, and an intelligent people; and if those qualities have so sunk out of sight and practice that fraud in a matter touching their interests so deeply as the choice of their Chief Magistrate can be perpetrated in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and the man survive it or the party survive it, then I say that our Government has been formed in vain, and we have only proved that we are unfit and unworthy of it.

In the various attempts which have been honestly made, intelligently made, to prescribe some means by which perfect justice may be reached in this important matter of counting these votes, I have felt the truth of Lord Bolingbroke's saying, versified by Pope:

For forms of government let fools contest, Whate'er is best administer'd is best.

We had in this country no question as to the action of the Vice-President in opening the certificates; the count of the tellers appointed for the mere arithmetical calculation of the votes cast never was questioned in this country until 1872. Then, under the maleficient working of a rule adopted without regard to the Constitution, under the assumption of powers utterly unwarranted by the two Houses of Congress, there came the assumption of a veto power by either branch of Congress, in silence, without debate, without reason, to throw out the electoral vote and disfranchise one or more communities at will. It was done. It was done in the case of Louisiana. It was done in the face of ballots then in existence, done in the face of returns then in existence which proclaimed palpably that the election had been held and that a majority of many thousand votes had been cast in favor of one electoral ticket. And yet the people of that State were deprived of any voice, and that majority was silenced in respect of its declaration as to who should or who should not be the President of the United States.

Now, sir, I can well understand that in the scant language of the Constitution, in those brief unsatisfactory phrases in which we find all that is to guide us—simply that the two Houses are to meet; thata certain officer is to preside, and that he is to open the certificates, and that then the counting is to take place—there is no suggestion of judgment, no suggestion of discretion, but simply the power to recite in a public meeting the result of action which has taken place the retofore in the States, and which is certified, according to the Constitution of the United States, to a certain officer of the Government. If the spirit which I trust will yet be the ruling spirit of this country, of self-respect in officers, of self-respect in people, of duty and fidelity to the great trusts of government—if this spirit shall prevail, I shall not fear that low fraud can ever be perpetrated in high places without instant moral, and I had almost said I trust physical, death would follow to the persons who attempt it. But nevertheless the time may arise; the suggestion, the evil suggestion has been made, and this bill unfortunately recognizes that fact as a possibility, that without the machinery for conducting a contested election of electors you are still to have a contest without the proper means of deciding it; and how is that to be done? A, B, and C, with their confederates, ten in number say, from the same State, are voted for against ten other men as electors respectively. One of the tickets is defeated. It is so declared by the executive power of the State to have been defeated. Those on the defeated ticket, not satisfied with the verdict of the people, losing sight of that great duty of acquiescence in the popular declaration, meet and go through the forms of casting their electoral votes for a candidate, and send up here to the President of the Senate that which purports to be the result of their proceedings and a certificate of how their votes were cast. It has been done; the evil suggestion has been made, and this bill proposes to meet it. I for one am glad that it takes not the shape of a joint rule, which may be rescinded at will, as we have seen in this late joint rule begotten and carried into effect in silence and retired from without notification to the other branch of Congress simply by the sole action of the Senate. That rule is at an end. It has proved (not speaking of its own intrinsic want of merit) to have one of the greatest vices that a regulation can have, and that is a want of stability and certainty, because its existence depends upon the pleasure of the accidental majority of either body of Congress. Therefore it is plain that, if we can provide a wholesome and just and proper rule for this important subject, it should take the permanent form of a law, which can only be rescinded by the vote of each House and the signature of the President. Therefore to provide for meeting this question by legislation seems to me the proper way; and the only remaining consideration is whether we have the power under the Constitution so to deal with the subject.

I am inclined to think that there is some power in Congress on this subject. At the same time, I think the discussion we have had will develop to any thinking man the necessity for an amendment to the Constitution, so that there shall be with greater clearness a deposit of unquestioned and unquestionable power in some tribunal upon whose decision the American people will rest with satisfaction and with safety. But until that may be done, I still hope that there may be found warrant for some action which will make confusion, injustice, fraud, and escape from popular results difficult, if not absolutely im-

Here by this first section provision is made for the orderly count of the votes, and that no votes shall be rejected without the concurrent action of the two Houses. Then comes the questionable section, the second, which provides that, in case more than one return shall be received from any State, that one of the returns only shall be counted which the concurrent voices of the two Houses, acting separately, shall concur is the proper one to be counted, which means that, if the Houses fail to agree, the vote of the State is not to be counted at all. It will be then perceived that by a disagreement the same result is reached as though you had an absolute veto. The two Houses have but to disagree in regard to the counting of one and then the other of these duplicate returns and no vote is cast. Sir, I do not believe that by any ingenuity, arguing either by the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, it is possible to show that it ever was intended that the two Houses of Congress should disfranchise any State and keep her voice from being heard, according to her right, in the electoral college. I do not believe such a result can be honestly or fairly inferred or obtained from either the spirit or the letter of our charter of Government; and therefore when this question may arise it is bound to be settled in such a way that the voice of the State shall be heard, and that her electoral vote shall not be excluded from the canvass.

Many propositions have been made, and chiefly on this side of the Chamber, to ensure this result. That which was offered by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] came nearest to meeting my approbation. I was absent accidentally from the Chamber, as was he, at the time the vote was taken upon it, and for that reason I have renewed the amendment, and now occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments while I discuss it.

It will be observed that the sole duty and the sole power of the two Houses meeting to witness this counting, and the sole result of that joint convention under the Constitution in the Hall of the House of Representatives, is the ascertainment of a majority of the electoral votes for a candidate for the Presidency and likewise for the Vice-Presidency. The Constitution requires that the person taking this office shall have a majority of all the votes of the electoral college; and, unless that majority shall be found and shall be declared, no election has taken place; and then, immediately upon the failure to ascertain and declare such majority, the power and the duty at once devolve upon the House of Representatives to choose by ballot the President from those two persons having the highest number of votes. What shall defeat the possibility to declare a majority if there be but one return from each State, as there should be if decorum, if self-respect and decency shall govern the American people as heretofore, with the single exception of the case of Louisiana in 1872? Then there will be nothing but the arithmetical calculation of the votes as contained in the single certificates sent by each State to that joint assembly. But if there be a double return, the impossibility of declaring the majority becomes manifest; and then what is the course plainly provided by the Constitution? An election by the House of Representatives, the States voting as States. I do not propose to discuss—it is not necessary—the advisability of this feature of the Constitution. I think a great deal could be said to show why it was wise and right; but, whether wise or otherwise, it is the method pointed out by the Constitution, which we are all sworn to obey; and it seems to me that, when we have reached a point when a decision must be made in regard to matters not apparently provided for, we can show our duty to this Government and our subordination to the provisions of this charter in no way so well as by adapting them to the case in hand. Therefore, if it shall be that two returns come up and the two Houses do not agree that the proper return shall be counted, then the amendment of the honorable Senator from Tennessee proposes instantly that the tribunal shall settle the question of the proper return which the Constitution has required to choose the President, in case a majority has not been declared of the electoral votes in favor of one of the candidates. The method proposed is in prein rayor of one of the candidates. The method proposed is in precise analogy; it is not only in analogy but it is in direct obedience to the requirements of the Constitution that confide the question of election immediately to the House of Representatives, that they shall vote as States individually in the event of the joint convention failing to find that a majority of all the votes of the electoral college have been cast for any particular candidate.

Such a proposition, it seems to me, ought to be satisfactory to those who look, as I trust we all do, to the provisions of the Constitution for all the just powers which we propose to exercise.

Sir, it is very important in my opinion that an arbitrament should be provided in advance for this question of double returns. Double returns are in their nature and suggestion fraudulent on one side or the other, because there can be but one set of electors chosen and those who contest it unjustly necessarily are fraudulent. Now, if it shall be known in advance that we have provided a test for this, if it shall be known that we have provided a tribunal capable of making a prompt decision, then I believe the attempt will never be made. The very fact of providing for the arbitrament of choice between two returns, and having that before the eyes of the rogues who propose to contest elechaving that before the eyes of the rogues who propose to contest elec-tions in this way, will deter and discourage them, and the Senate and the House will have no trouble whatever on the subject. Nor have I any idea that the House of Representatives will be called upon at all to act under the provisions of the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's table. Those who propose this species of contest—be-cause there must be of these two returns but one that is right—will see the folly of the attempt, which can end only in defeat. And when we shall have established a tribunal competent and trustworthy, the very one provided by the Constitution for the election of the Presivery one provided by the Constitution for the election of the President himself in case a majority of the electional votes has not been declared by the joint convention, when the States acting in their independent and sovereign capacity shall vote as individuals upon this subject, when that power and duty is confided to them, we may be sure that the attempt at a double return will never be made, and the count of the electoral votes will proceed with all that dignity, with all that simplicity, with all that impressiveness which marked it in days

The spectacle of an administration charged and possessed with all the great affairs of a Government like this, quietly, subordinately giving way to the new expression of the popular will, has been always something that has impressed not only those accustomed in other lands to the violent emotion of rulers no longer desired by the people, but it has been, I believe, a source of more pure patriotic pride to the American people to see their Government a Government of law and of order before which when the wish of the people is duly expressed instant acquiescence to it took place with order, with dignity, and

It is my earnest desire that all causes of dissatisfaction, of conflict, of misunderstanding, of possible difference should be removed, if possible, in advance by some action now in the shape of legislation by Congress. I believed at the beginning of this session, and still believe, that it would have been wiser to commit this question in advance to a joint committee of the two Houses; that they could in seclusion and retirement, without any of the excitement of debate, arrange upon some plan that would have been mutually satisfactory to each House, and therefore likely to command the assent of both will not yet despair. I still hope that, if this measure as it shall be passed by the Senate may not meet the concurrence of the House, a committee of conference may yet arrange it. I cannot conceive how any man can so degrade this subject as to bring it down to a mere partisan level. I cannot see how any man contemplating the great difficulty of this subject should not be willing to sink his private opinion in regard to measures in order to do everything that in him lay to produce a quiet, orderly, dignified, and just settlement of this question. Believing that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee is the best solution thus far submitted to the Senate, and that the vote upon it was taken before perhaps with somewhat of inadvertence, I trust it now will receive the approval of the Senate.

As I have said before, I believe the constitution of this tribunal of the House as the ultimate judge in case of difference between the two Houses as to which of the two returns shall be the just one—the mere constitution of that arbiter will of itself destroy the possibility of attempted contest or of attempted duplicate returns. The attempt will not be made because defeat certainly will await it. "Forewarned is forearmed," and therefore I will not believe that in the next presidential election, if this present measure shall become the law, the country will be distracted, disgusted, or disgraced by the sight of an attempt to contest an election by a defeated minority.

For these reasons, Mr. President, hastily and very lamely expressed, I hope the Senate will give its assent to this amendment.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that this discussion has demonstrated the absolute necessity of the adoption of a law upon this subject. The diversity of opinion that has been developed here in a season of profound repose, when no party question can enter into it, when it is above and independent of party considerations, shows the necessity of having some established rule when the time comes to count the presidential vote.

Let me suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the two Houses have assembled in the Hall of the House of Representatives to count the votes; let me suppose that two sets of electoral votes have been sent here from the State of Connecticut, and they are opened by the President of the Senate. What shall be done? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] rises and says, "I demand that the President of the Senate shall decide which set of votes shall be counted." The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] rises and says, as he said here to-day, "No, a thousand times no; the President of the Senate has no to-day, "No, a thousand times no; the President of the Senate has no such power; the decision must be by this joint convention acting as one legislative body, each Senator and each Representative having one vote; that is the only constitutional method of settling this question between these electoral votes." He takes his seat. Then the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] rises in his place and says, "No, a thousand times no! There is no such thing as a joint convention; a body of that kind has never been recognized under the Constitution, never has been recognized by anybody in three-quarters of a centry." I understood my friend from Connecticut to say toof a century. I understood my friend from Connecticut to say today that for three-quarters of a century the idea of a joint convention had been recognized. I submit that my friend was mistaken in this, that for three-quarters of a century it never was recognized, and It is the forthee-quarters of a century it never was recognized, and I think was never seriously proposed by anybody. The Senator from Ohio says the Senate and the House of Representatives are present here under the Constitution as witnesses and as judges; and if a question shall arise involving a high discretionary power, it cannot be decided by the President of the Senate, whose duty is ministerial; it cannot be decided by a joint convention utterly unknown to the Constitu-be decided by a joint convention interry linknown to the Constitution, entirely anomalous under our system of government; but it must be decided like any other question, by the Senate and House of Representatives, each acting for itself and in its own capacity.

This is the state of the case. The election is to depend upon which set of votes is counted from Connecticut. If one set is counted, the republican candidate is elected; if the other set is counted, the democratic candidate is elected; and here is a diversity of opinion and confusion equal to that which prevailed at Babel. How is it to be settled? Shall the two Houses separate, we to work, and legislate on confusion equal to that which prevailed at Babel. How is it to be settled? Shall the two Houses separate, go to work, and legislate on that question? That may take days. It has taken us seven days here now, in a time of profound repose, to consider this bill, and I am not sure that we shall get through with it to-day, for I am in momentary apprehension that some Senator will get up and move an executive session. But here the votes are to be counted. The 4th of March is close at hand. An utter diversity of opinion exists as to where the power is. The two Houses cannot separate and legislate. What is to be done? We can easily understand what will intervent. It was to be done? We can easily understand what will intervene. It was suggested by the Senator from Delaware a while ago that, in case an officer shall make a wrong decision, the moral reprobation of the world would fall upon him, and he said perhaps physical punishment; that is, he might fall like Cæsar. We can understand when such vast consequences are to depend upon the exercise of a power that may be a clear usurpation, and would be in the opinion of a majority of the people of this country, that that usurpation could not pass with impunity. How, then, can we decide that it shall be done by a joint convention in the passion and excitement of the hour and with such vast consequences depending upon it? How, then, can we decide that it shall be done by the two Houses; acting separately? It might be understood that, if the two Houses were to act separately, the question might be decided one way; if by a joint convention, another way; and, if by the President of the Senate, possibly another way; and the immediate result of the adoption of one or the other of these methods would come in largely to influence the judgment and increase the confusion and the danger of the hour. Therefore, I exhort Senators to avoid this danger by agreeing upon some method. It is not so important what that method is as that there shall be some plan agreed upon that will avoid these dangers which are right before us.

Mr. BAYARD. I concur most earnestly and warmly in this invita-tion of the Senator from Indiana; and there is now, by the amend-ment of the Senator from Tennessee, which I have offered again, a fair and a constitutional arbitrament, where the two Houses shall disagree, to prevent the occurrence of that which my honorable friend from Indiana and I both so justly dread and deplore. The proposi-tion is this: that we shall leave it just where our fathers left it; we shall leave it to the same body, acting as they said that body should act when the broad question of the election of President, without respect to the mere contest of votes, should be before them. Leave it just as they left it, to that body for its decision which they said was the proper one to decide the great question of elections, where a majority of the votes of the electoral college had not been declared by the Houses in joint convention to have been cast in favor of any candidate. I agree with my friend that it is not so much the quescandidate. Tagree with my friend that it is not so much the question as to how you shall have this matter settled, although it is important to us as citizens under a constitutional government and acting under its limitations, that we should not create a tribunal unwarranted by the Constitution; but here is a tribunal pointed out by the Constitution as the peculiar and fitting one upon whom immediately shall devolve the duty of electing the President and Vice-President in case a majority of the electoral votes have not been ascertained to have been cast for any particular candidate. What objection tained to have been cast for any particular candidate. What objection can there be in my friend's mind to adopting this proposition of the Senator from Delaware and to state the objection to referring the decision of the question to the House of Representatives voting by States. First, because the Constitution has made no provision for by States. First, because the Constitution has made no provision for the decision or settlement of any question, judicial or legislative, by the House of Representatives voting by States. It has provided for the election of a President, an anomalous, unfair, and, in my judgment, dangerous method, in a certain case; but in no other contingency is there to be any question settled in this Government by the House of Representatives voting by States. I would not extend the idea of settling questions by the vote of States, giving to the State of Nevada the same voice with New York, which has one hundred and fourteen times the propulation of Nevada.

fourteen times the population of Nevada.

Mr. WHYTE. I want to ask the Senator from Indiana if he does not really, under the second section of this bill, in a certain contingency, do the very thing that he now objects to doing; that is to say, upon a certain contingency throw the election into the House of Representatives? Take this case, and it is a mathematical calculation. It takes 185 votes to elect a President of the United States in the present college, counting Colorado. Suppose there are three candidates at the election. The republican candidate gets 177 undisputed votes; and the independent candidate 24 undisputed votes, which he could do by getting Illinois and Nevada and Nebraska. Suppose the could do by getting Illinois and Nevada and Nebraska. Suppose the democratic candidate gets 160 undisputed votes, leaving 8 votes, the votes of Louisiana, to determine whether the republican candidate was elected or not. Suppose that in Louisiana there is a contested was elected or not. Suppose that in Louisiana there is a contested election of great violence. The independent candidate is supposed by one party to be elected; the republican candidate is supposed by the other party to be elected. The republican electors get a certificate from Governor Kellogg of their election, cast their vote for the republican candidate, and that return comes to the President of the Senate. Suppose the electors on the independent ticket meet as a college, cast their votes for the independent candidate, certify under the Constitution, if there is no provision for the executive authentication of their election, that they have voted for the independent candidate. These returns are enemed by the President of the Senate candidate. Those returns are opened by the President of the Senate. The House honestly believe that the independent electors were elected in Louisiana. The republicans in the Senate believe that the republican candidates were elected. They separate. The House stands by the independent organization, the Senate stands by the republican election, thus defeating the election of President and throwing it into the Honse of Representatives under the second section of the bill.

Mr. MORTON. I think the precise contingency mentioned by the Senator from Maryland may happen either by the vote of a State being lost, the two Houses not being able to decide, or by being cast in favor of an independent candidate; but that is the precise contingency which the Constitution has provided for when it declares that unless some one person shall have a majority of all the electors appointed the Hensechell immediately proceed to the the State Hensechell immediately proceed to the theory of the state of t does that change the principle? The Constitution has provided for the action of the House by States only in one case. Shall we extend that principle? The Constitution does not provide for the House by States only in one case. Shall we extend that principle? The Constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple the constitution are constituted as the constitution of the constitution of the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution are constituted as the constitution of the constitution of the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution are constitution to the constitution of the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding any legislative or judicial question by States, but simple constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding the constitution does not provide for the House ever deciding the constitution does not provide for the house ever deciding the constitution does not provide for the house ever deciding the c ply an election in certain cases; and in my opinion it is the most dangerous contrivance ever put into the Constitution. Would you extend that principle to the mere decision of a question on the electoral vote when that may decide the question of an election?

The first election of President by the House took place in 1801, the House voting by States. The delegation from two States was divided from the 10th of February to the 17th, from the first to the thirty-sixth ballot, Vermont and Maryland. The dead-lock was finally broken by an intrigue, one member from Vermont dodging the vote, going out of the House, and two members from Maryland casting blank ballots. The history of that election, given by the distinguished member from Delaware, Mr. Bayard, two years afterward, shows that it was thoroughly corrupt in the sense in which that word is used in these times; that that election was controlled by appointments of members of the House of Representatives to office. More, there is an affidavit on file— I have it here, but I will not stop to read it—which shows that the vote of another State, on the last day when the election of Jefferson was finally made, was controlled by an agreement that the collectors of the district of Delaware and of the port of Philadelphia should not be removed by Mr. Jefferson. That election came near making shipwreck of the Government at that time. What followed in 1825, when Mr. Adams was elected? The same charge of corruption existed, a charge from which the great Clay never escaped, because he voted for Adams in the House, and was afterward appointed Secretary of State. How did that election result? Mr. Adams was elected, who received less than one-third of the popular vote of the United States; and General Jackson was defeated, who received the largest popular majority that any President ever has done up to this hour. The will of the people was overridden in 1825, and this form of election presents the opportunity and the power of doing that always. It presents the greatest possible inducement and the greatest possible opportunity for corruption. God grant we shall never have to pass through the ordeal of another election of President by the House of Representatives.

I want to make a remark in regard to the amendment of my distinguished friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE;] and what I shall say will touch the whole question of furnishing an umpire either by the Supreme Court or by the House of Representatives or in any other form. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island is this: that as soon as the electoral certificates are sent to the President of the Senate, before the time comes for counting the vote, they shall be sent to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court or to

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, it does not provide that they shall be sent to the Supreme Court, but the fact is to be reported to the Supreme Court.

Mr. MORTON. I give the substance, the idea of the amendment, that when the certificates are made up by the electoral colleges they shall indorse on the outside of the envelope, so that it can be read, (because the envelopes cannot be opened under the Constitution until you come to count the vote,) the names of the electors, by whom certified, and when elected, so that the Supreme Court shall be able to determine by an inspection of the outside of the envelope whether or not these electors were chosen under the recognized State government and have been certified by the recognized authority of the State. I submit to my friend, and I will read a very brief extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court to show it, that that transfers to the Supreme Court of the United States one of the great powers expressly reposed in Congress under the Constitution. The United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government, and to decide which is the government of a State, and whether it is republican in its form, is a power expressly devolved upon Congress, and cannot be transferred or deputed except for a single purpose, and that is to enable the President to determine what government he will sustain in a case of insurrection or domestic violence. In the case of Luther vs. Borden, a case familiar to you all, the court say:

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the unifority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

In the case supposed, where there are two sets of electors certified from two different pretended State governments, to decide which electors have a right to vote you must decide which is the government, and the decision of that question, which controls all others that may arise on it, is expressly vested in Congress under the Constitution. We cannot transfer it to the Supreme Court in advance. We cannot transfer it to any other power, except for the single and sole purpose of carrying out another provision, and that is to enable the President to protect the State against invasion or domestic violence, where it may be necessary, under the act of 1795, for the President to determine, when Congress is not in session, which is the lawful government of the State, as he undertook to do in the case of Louisiana.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will ask the Senator from Indiana if there can be no case before the Supreme Court by appeal which would require them to decide which is the lawful State government? Could there not be a case by appeal from a lower court by which the Supreme Court would be called upon to decide which was the State government?

I want to ask the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] one questions to the state of the stat tion. He says that in settling this question we should adhere to the rule established by the framers of the Constitution and allow the same method to be used in determining which are the correct returns as is used to elect the President when no one of the candidates has a majority. I submit to him and I submit to the Senate that in case no one candidate receives a majority every State has a right to vote as a State according to its political proclivities. It becomes a political question. They are bound to adhere to their separate political parties, in honor bound to vote for the men who represent their party, no matter whether they have received the highest number of votes or not. The question under discussion should not be decided politi-cally; but if you leave it to be decided in the same way that you elect a President, in case neither candidate receives a majority it will be decided in a partisan spirit; whereas by the method I propose it will be decided upon its legal merits.

I submit that no party ties are so loose as to allow a member to vote just exactly as a judge on the bench of the Supreme Court would vote on a question of this kind. It is quite clear in my own mind that the proposition made by the Senator from Delaware, which he intended to make in all fairness, is not fair.

Mr. MORTON. It would perhaps be very desirable to have the solution of every question submitted to some tribunal entirely outsolution of every question submitted to some thounal entirity offi-side of political influences; and yet it so happens that the Supreme Court have said in this very case that the decision of the question as to which is the lawful State government in a State is a political ques-tion to be decided by Congress, and when decided by Congress that the Supreme Court of the United States and every other branch of the Government must abide by that decision. The power to settle that question has by the Constitution been placed in Congress, and I am trying to argue that we cannot take it out of Congress and lodge it anywhere else.

I come now to the other question asked by my friend, whether under certain circumstances the Supreme Court could not decide which was the lawful government of a State. So they can and did in the Rhode Island case. In that very case they recognized the doctrine that Congress is the power to settle the legal status of a State government, a political question, by which the courts are all bound; but in the absence of a decision by Congress, in that very case they said, as I have had occasion to argue in another matter before this body, that the supreme court of Rhode Island not being in question, its legitimacy not being questioned, the courts of the United States would follow the decision of the supreme court of the State of Rhode Island in determining which was the lawful government of that State. If the supreme court of Rhode Island had said that the charter government was the lawful government and not the Dorr government, the Supreme Court said it was bound to follow and to recognize the charter government as being the lawful government of Rhode Island. In that case the Supreme Court did decide it; but as a question coming up not from the decision of the lower court by appeal, as a political question to be decided as to which is the lawful government so as to know which government may certify to the electoral vote, that is a power that has been lodged in Congress, and it cannot be divested. We cannot commit it to anybody else.

I agree with my friend that if we could create an umpire, if it was in our power to refer the decision of this question to any other tribu-nal, I would prefer the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe the people would have more regard for its decision, that it would carry more authority, than any special tribunal we could create. Therefore I should prefer to refer it to that arbitrament if it were possible; but not regarding that as being within our power, I vote against the creation of any umpire. The least acceptable of all would be to refer it to the House and have it decided by a vote by States

I wish here to call the attention of the Senate to a fact which I I wish here to call the attention of the Senate to a fact which I have overlooked in the previous examination of this question, and that is, that so long ago as 1837 the Congress of the United States virtually assumed the jurisdiction to count the vote of a State in a case where the right of the State to vote at all was denied. I refer to the case of the State of Michigan. In that election there was a question as to whether the vote of the State of Michigan should be counted on account of a condition attached to her constitution. not entirely familiar with the details of the question, but the following joint resolution was adopted by the two Houses, showing that at that time the two Houses of Congress assumed the power to determine whether the vote should be counted in that case. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 34 to 9 in the Senate, and reads as fol-

That, in relation to the votes of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for A B for President of the United States, — votes; if not counted, for A B for President of the United States, but in either event A B is elected President of the United States, and in the same manner for Vice-President.

That was followed by the two Houses of Congress as late as 1869 in a joint resolution in reference to counting the vote of Georgia. The language of the two resolutions is identical. Evidently that offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in 1869 was copied from that in regard to Michigan in 1837.

Mr. WHYTE: I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that it is copied from Mr. Clay's resolution of 1821 in regard to Missouri.

Mr. MORTON. I simply refer to it briefly for the purpose of showing that Congress assumed substantially the power over these contested votes long ago, and that seems to have been the better judgment of members of the two Houses at different periods of our history.

Mr MAXEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question, as he has the floor, and I desire his opinion upon it. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island in substance is that where two certificates come up from the same State, purporting to be the cer-tificate of the electoral vote cast by that State, those returns are to be turned over or transferred by the President of the Senate to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court-

Who shall at once cause the said Supreme Court to proceed to examine as to who are the legal electors of said State, and shall have power to send for persons and papers; and the said Chief Justice shall, on or before the last Tuesday of January next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, report to the President of the Senate which of the said electors were legally elected.

The Constitution declares that:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

What I desire to have the Senator's opinion upon is this: Is it constitutional or legal for the President of the Senate to transfer to the Supreme Court or anybody else these certificates unopened? Second, if he has to open them, does not the Constitution require that "the votes shall then be counted?" Then where does the opportunity come in for the action of the Supreme Court as contemplated by this amendment? That is a question I cannot understand myself, and I should like to have the Senator's opinion upon it.

Mr. Morton. The Senator from Texas I think is quite right in his suggestion. If I understand it, his suggestion is that the President of the Senate is the custodian, and the sole custodian, of these certificates from the time they come to his hands; that he cannot transfer the custody of them to anybody; that he is responsible for them, and if they shall be lost he is to be held responsible. In the next place, clearly he cannot open them until he does it in the preence of the two Houses. Not until that moment is anybody entitled to know what the contents of these envelopes may be.

Mr. MAXEY. And then the votes must be counted.
Mr. MORTON. And then and there the votes must be counted.
These provisions grew out of the theory of the electoral college, that it was to be composed of a body of independent men, acting entirely independent of pledges, of all outside influences, who should come together, and without each other's knowledge vote by ballot, so that one should not know how the other voted; and then that they should seal these votes up and they should be kept a secret until the very moment they were to be counted. We have seen how the whole theory failed, but still this is the provision of the Constitution of the United States

One word in regard to the bill and I am done. In regard to the first section of the bill there seems to be little or no controversy. That is, that there shall be no electoral vote rejected except by a concurrent vote of both Houses. There seems to be little difference of opinion about that, and that is the most material provision. Nearly all the questions will arise under the first section of the bill. It may not occur for fifty years again that we shall have two sets of electoral votes from the same State. It may occur next fall, but the chances are small of such an event. If it should occur, it is not very likely that the two Houses of Congress, acting under the pressure of high and solemn considerations of duty, would not be able to agree as to which return should be counted; so that that contingency in regard to which all this debate has sprung up is very remote indeed. There seems to be a desire to get some tribunal which shall decide the question, and the introduction of the House, voting by States, is suggested, the one way of all others which is the most liable to have a deadlock; for if there should be an even number of States upon each side, or if the delegation from the States should be divided, as occurred in two States in the very first election even, then there is no decision. So that you can hardly imagine a tribunal that might be created, even if we had the power, where this contingency would not happen; but if the second section of the bill were stricken out altogether the first is of inestimable importance. If there be a contingency in the second section that is not quite provided for, still it does not take away the importance of passing the first section, or the second section either, because that contingency is exceedingly remote. We can understand in view of what took place three years ago last month the necessity of providing some method for counting these votes. We cannot as common lovers of our country and patriots, sworn to stand by this Government, pass over the duty of providing against such dangers as lie right at the door.

Therefore I trust, Mr. President, that this bill will not be defeated because of a remote possibility. I trust we will consider the main subject and the principal dangers that are covered by this bill, and I hope it will pass. As I said before, any plan is better than none almost. After hearing all that has been said upon both sides, and I section either, because that contingency is exceedingly remote.

almost. After hearing all that has been said upon both sides, and I must say this debate has been conducted with great candor and I think with great ability and fairness, I am not now able to see where the bill can be improved.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the second section. It provides that that return from such State shall be counted "which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return." The question has been suggested to me as to what is to happen in case the two Houses acting parately do not agree as to which return is the valid return.

Mr. MORTON. I suppose there would be no vote counted in that

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Ought it not to say so? It might be insisted by those who hold that the Constitution imposes the duty of counting the vote on the Vice-President that he was to count it. At all events, I think it ought not to be left in doubt, but the words ought to be added at the end of that sentence:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which is the true and valid return, then no vote shall be counted from that State.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator would arrive at the same thing by inserting the word "only" after the word "return;" "that return only from such State shall be counted."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not see that you can put it in fewer

I am sorry to see this bill not in a better shape than it is. I have no doubt when the Constitution imposes a duty upon Congre and says we shall count the vote, that we have the constitution imposes a duty upon Congress, and says we shall count the vote, that we have the constitutional right by legislation to do everything that is necessary to the safe counting of that vote. We have a perfect right by legislation to carry it out by creating a tribunal, and doing everything that it is necessary to do in order to secure a safe and complete count. The Constitution says so. The Constitution says we have got the right to pass all laws that are necessary to carry out the powers conferred by the Constitu-

As to the plan of referring the question to the House of Representatives, that House voting by States, it does seem to me that that is contrary to the Constitution. There is one point where I differ from the Senator from Delaware. It seems to me the Constitution precludes us from adopting the plan he proposes because the Constitu-tion has spoken. It has told us in what exigencies the election shall be determined by the House voting by States, and the expression of the case in which that is to be resorted to is the exclusion of all intendment that the House in any other emergency might decide upon

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on his amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I will vote for the amendment proposed by my colleague, though I would have preferred to have the amendment adopted as it was offered originally by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper.]

The bill of the Senator from Indiana does provide expressly for the rejection of the vote of a State. I am unwilling to vote for a measure which provides that the vote of any State of this Union shall be rejected, because I believe it is within the power of Congress to provide some fair and proper mode by which the vote of every State in this Union may be counted in the election of President. The amendment of Greed by my collegens is one mode and perhaps the foirest ment offered by my colleague is one mode, and perhaps the fairest mode that we can now hope to obtain for reaching that result. I shall mode that we can now hope to obtain for reaching that result. I shall therefore support the amendment, and hope that it may be adopted. I have listened to this whole debate, I am free to say, with unusual interest, because the questions presented by the bill and the amendments are, as I conceive, of vital importance. If I understood the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] aright, and also the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Stevenson,] they believe that there is an omission in the Constitution, and that the defect can only be remedied by a constitutional amendment. With that view I do not concur; but I think that if there is any defect, the power is granted to Congress by express provision to make all laws necessary to carry out the grants of power contained in the Constitution; and that the power to count power contained in the Constitution; and that the power to count the votes having been expressly given, Congress may determine the mode by which the votes shall be counted.

This is not a new question. It has been here before. The Congress of the United States as far back as 1800 considered this subject. I do not believe the discussion that occurred in the year 1800 upon this very question has been referred to in this debate, and perhaps it may not be amiss to call the attention of the Senate to that debate. The Senator from Maryland favored the idea that the President of The Senator from Maryland favored the idea that the President of the Senate was to count the votes. So far back as 1800 this question was brought to the attention of Congress, and was discussed in Congress, and I propose to show what the view of Congress, or at least a number of the members of Congress, at that time was upon the question of the power of Congress to deal with this subject. On January 23, 1800, on the motion of Mr. Ross, the Senate—

Resolved. That a committee be appointed to consider whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made by law for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States, and for determining the legality or illegality of the votes given for those officers in the different States.

On the next day it was

And that committee reported a bill the provisions of which in full I have not been able to ascertain. On February 14—

Mr. Ross, from the committee appointed the 28th of January last, reported a bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States; which was read and ordered to the second reading.

Some of the provisions of that bill I have been able to find, but not the whole of it in detail. The bill took up the whole subject. Some of the provisions of the bill provided for the appointment of what was called a grand committee selected out of the two Houses of Congress to meet in secret session, there to examine all the votes cast for President and all the petitions and reports that were made from the several States in connection with those votes, and to determine upon the legality of the votes thus cast.

Mr. MERRIMON. Where did it lodge the power?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It lodged it in the two Houses of Congress, so far as I have been able to gather from such provisions of the bill as I have been able to find in this book. On March 3—

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment proposed to the first section of the bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

I will read what was the substance of the provisions of the bill from a speech made by Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, who opposed the bill and spoke against it. In the course of his speech he said:

What is the mode proposed by this bill? That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States shall each of them elect six members, who, with a chairman, be appointed by the latter from a nomination of the former, would form a grand committee, who should, sitting with closed doors, have a right to examine all the votes given by the electors in the several States for President and Vice-President, and all the memorials and petitions respecting them, and have power finally to decide respecting them, and to declare what votes of different States shall be rejected and what admitted, and, in short, that this committee thus chosen, and sitting with closed doors, shall possess complete, uncontrollable, and irrevocable power to decree, without appeal from their decision, who has been returned, and who shall be proclaimed President of the United States.

That is the even size of the bill reported by the committee contained.

That is the synopsis of the bill reported by the committee, contained in a speech of Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina. That bill was considered at various times during the session and various amendments were offered. One amendment I will read:

The bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States was read the third time.

On motion to strike out the ten first sections and insert—

I will read now what was proposed to be inserted as showing what the opinion of members of Congress at that time was as to the power of Congress to deal with the question of counting, determining, and passing upon the votes of electors. The amendment is as follo passing upon the votes of electors. The amendment is as follows:

Whereas, on an election of President and Vice-President of the United States, questions may arise whether an elector has been appointed in a mode authorized by the Legislature of his State or not; whether the time at which he was chosen and the day he gave his vote were those determined by Congress; whether he was not at the time a Senator or Representative of the United States, or held an office of trust or profit under the United States; whether one at least of the persons he has voted for is an inhabitant of a State other than his own: whether the electors voted by ballot, and have signed, certified, and transmitted to the President of the Senate a list of all the persons voted for, and the number of votes for each; whether the persons voted for are natural-born citizens, or were citizens of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, were thirty-five years old, and had been fourteen years resident within the United States; and the Constitution of the United States having directed that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and that the votes shall then be counted," from which the reasonable inference and practice has been that they are to be counted by the members composing the said Houses, and brought there for that office, no other being assigned them; and inferred the more reasonably, as thereby the constitutional weight of each State in the election of those high officers is exactly preserved in the tribunal which is to judge of its validity, the number of Senators and Representatives from each State composing the said tribunal being exactly that of the electors of the same State.

And then follows the amendment in the form of a section to carry out the objects proposed in the preamble. I will read the section:

And then follows the amendment in the form of a section to carry out the objects proposed in the preamble. I will read the section:

Section I. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That whensoever the members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be assembled for the purpose of having the certificates of the electors of the several States opened and counted, the names of the several States shall be written on different and similar tickets of paper and put into a ballot-box, out of which one shall be drawn at a time; and so soon as one is drawn the packet containing the certificates of that State shall be opened by the President of the Senate, and shall then be read, and then shall be read also the petitions, depositions, and other papers and documents concerning the same; and, if no exception is taken thereto, the votes contained in such certificates shall be counted; but if the votes, or any of them, shall be objected to, the members present shall, on the question propounded by the President of the Senate, decide, without debate, by yea or nay, whether such vote or votes are constitutional or not; and the votes of one State being thus counted, another ticket shall be drawn from the ballot-box, and the certificate and the votes of the State being thus counted, another ticket shall be drawn from the ballot-box, and the certificate and the votes of the State being thus counted, another ticket shall be drawn from the ballot-box, and the certificate and the votes of the State being thus counted, another ticket shall be drawn from the members of the said two Houses may adjourn from day to day until it be completed. A division of the question was called for, and that it first be taken on striking out. A motion was made to strike out of section 1, lines 10 and 11, these words: "and finally to decide" and to insert "into and report upon;" and a division of the motion was called for, and the first be faken on striking out; which passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 18.

After several amendments were

After several amendments were considered the bill was finally discussed at length by Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina. He opposed the bill, but he seemed to admit in his argument the right of Congress to count the vote.

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present, not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the ejection of a President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses—

That favors the idea of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Eaton]and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors so transmitted.

While he opposed the general provisions of the bill he went to the extent of passing upon the qualifications of the electors, taking it entirely away from the State; and he seemed in his argument to admit the power of Congress to determine the question of the votes. In that debate one of the questions that arose was that which has arisen in this debate, what is to be done with double returns? Mr. Pinckney took up that question, and after reading his speech I undertake to say that he did not deal with it with that frankness which his eminent character justifies us in supposing he ought to have dealt with it. He seemed to evade the question, did not meet it, but he seemed to meet it as my friend from Connecticut met it this morning by expressing his confidence in Congress and his confidence in every public man in the country. He could not anticipate that there would be any difficulty; he could not in the first place anticipate that such returns would be made. He had then the unbounded confidence that is exhibited by the Senator from Connecticut to-day. And yet our history proves that Mr. Pinckney was mistaken just as I fear the subsequent history of the country will prove that the Senator from Connecticut is mistaken when he expresses such unbounded confidence, not only in the Senate of the United States, but in every public man, the Vice-President, the Speaker of the House, and the members of this House and of the other. I share largely in the confidence which he has expressed in reference to humanity, but I have seen enough of life to know that our confidence is frequently misplaced, and I want to prepare against any contingency that may happen.

That bill came finally to a vote in the Senate of the United States after the exhaustive argument of Mr. Pinckney, and I wish to read the names of the Senators who voted upon that bill.

When Mr. P. had concluded, the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 12, as follows:
YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Dexter, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Lloyd, Paine, Read—

From my own State-

Ross, Schureman, Tracy, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Livermore, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

The proceedings to which I have referred show that at that early day the power was claimed for Congress not only to deal with the question we are now discussing, but to deal with other questions, questions which I do not believe we have the right to deal with. But the power of providing the mode of counting the electoral vote by legislation, especially where there is a seeming omission in the Constitution itself, was then fully recognized, and these proceedings clearly indicate it.

I would not attempt to confer upon one House or both Houses of I would not attempt to confer upon one House or both Houses or Congress any power which is not expressly granted to them, for I am a strict constructionist of the Constitution. I believe that we have no right as a Congress to exercise any power which is not expressly given or which is not necessary to carry out the grants of power expressly given in the Constitution. I would not usurp any power whatever. I am as free from doing that as my honorable friend from Maryland or my honorable friend from Connecticut; but I do contend that the criticisms upon the position of my friend from Ohio are not warranted by the precedents that have been referred to as conclusive upon the contemporances interpretation of the provisions of the upon the contemporaneous interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution in this behalf. I hold that the incident which I have cited shows that at an early day, when the men were living who took part in the formation of the Constitution, when they were members of the Congress of the United States, this power was claimed for Congress. Some of the gentlemen who participated in the formation of the Constitution were there and voted upon the question. I would not, I repeat, invade that Constitution. I believe that the true interests and the true destiny of this country require a strict adherence to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. I would not usurp the power by Congress, but I would carry out the provisions of the Constitution. I would count the vote as it is. There is a provision in the bill of the Senator from Indiana that in a certain contingency the vote of a State shall not be counted, and I am opposed to that bill without some amendment to secure to every State in this Union the right to have her electoral vote counted.

Mr. President, I conceive that this is an important question. It is Mr. President, I conceive that this is an important question. It is one that ought not to be hastily passed upon, and I think the seven days which have been spent in the investigation and discussion of this subject have not been spent in vain. I hope that no hurried action will be taken, but that some action may be adopted in this House which will be concurred in by the other House, and that we may make proper provisions to remedy the evil which is seen and acknowledged by all.

I have said much more on this question than I designed to say at the

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I desire to make but a single remark, and that is, that the Supreme Court of the United States substantially decided in the Rhode Island case, to which the Senator from Indiana referred, that it was in the power of Congress to call upon the courts to decide which of the representatives of the State governments was in accord with the Government of the United States. I am indebted for this suggestion to the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. Jones.]

If Congress has the right to call on the Supreme Court of the United States for a decision upon that point, it has the right to do it in this case. Some of the most distinguished Senators have said that this amendment presented the most desirable way to settle the difficulty, if it could be done constitutionally; and here, it seems to me, we have this point settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, unless I misconstrue the substance of that decision.

nave this point settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, unless I misconstrue the substance of that decision.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, it is perhaps necessary for me to say a word in regard to my view of what the court did decide in the case of Luther vs. Borden. It did say, and the opinion will bear me out, that it was competent for Congress to designate a court that should have the power to say which of two rival powers in a State should be recognized as the legitimate power, with a view of obtaining the assistance contemplated by the Constitution to be extended by the Union. That was decided, beyond all doubt.

Mr. MERRIMON. Have you the decision before you?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have not. The court said that Congress had delegated the authority to the President by the act of 1795, and that it had done so wisely; but that it was equally competent for Congress to delegate the same authority to a court for a like purpose, and to withdraw it from the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The amendment is to modify the second section before the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] to strike it out and insert a substitute. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. Burnside.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest an amendment to come in the second section—and I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to it in order to make that clear which by possibility is not so clear as it stands now. As it reads now it is:

And that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

I propose to insert after the word "return" in line 7 the words and that return only.

Mr. MORTON. That is what it is intended to mean, but I have no objection to the word "only" going in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON and others. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the seventh line of the section, after the word "return," it is proposed to insert "and that only;" so as to read:

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes, and that return, and that only, from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. MORTON. I think the word "only" would be sufficient; but I have no objection to the words "and that only."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to offer an amendment merely to take the sense of the Senate. I move to strike out all after the word "certified," in the twenty-sixth line of the first section, down to section 4, and to insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the following:

The President of the Senate shall in the first instance decide without debate upon all such questions and announce his decisions thereon; and when he shall have counted all the votes he shall announce the result according to his decision. After the whole count has been so made and the result thereof announced, if it appears that the result will be changed by the reversal of decisions made by the President of the Senate, any member of either House may appeal from any such decision. Upon such appeal the vate shall be taken by States, the members of both Houses from each State severally giving one vote.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the doors are actually closed, I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken on the passage of Senate bill No. 1 relative to counting the electoral votes; and I wish to say a word. The vote on the bill strikes me with some surprise. What there is that gives any advantage to one party over another in it is past my comprehension. I do not see it in the bill, but there is an objection that has weighed no doubt with many who voted against the bill, and that is that it leaves a case unprovided for, a case where there are two returns from a State. It does not arrive at an ultimate decision, or at least it may not, on that question. I am strongly impressed with the belief that unless the Senate can become more harmonious than it is on this bill, we have no chance to get a law on the subject at this session. Therefore I, for one, am anxious to make one more effort in this body, where such a thing as debate is allowed, where a calm consideration of a great question can take place, to have this matter further considered.

Mr. MORTON. Do you propose to have it considered to-night?
Mr. THURMAN. No; but I ask that the motion to reconsider may be entered in order that it may be further considered.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 24, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ABSTINENCE BY OFFICE-HOLDERS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hold in my hand a memorial which I have received from the Women's Temperance League of Winchester, Indiana, signed by 1,104 citizens of that State, mostly ladies, asking congressional legislation to promote temperance in the service of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial may be printed in the RECORD—it is very brief—and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, which has the subject under consideration.

Mr. KELLEY. The memorial, not the names?

Mr. MOLMAN. Yes. The memorial only I wish printed in the

There was no objection, and the memorial was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, members of the Women's Temperance League of Winchester, Indiana, and citizens of Randolph County, do most earnestly and respectfully, in consequence of the great and growing evil of intemperance, spreading as it does crime, pauperism, ignorance, and o'her miseries through all grades of our American society, petition your honorable body to so amend the oath required of all the officers in the service of the United States as to require them to abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage during their torm of office. This we ask because of the representative character of the persons whom the people have placed in such official position, and because of the salutary and beneficial influence such requirements and consequent conduct would exert upon all the young men of the nation, and also believing that such amendment to the oath of office, with the penalty of removal for its violation, would annually save millions of dollars for the Government.

Government.

We therefore most earnestly entreat you to grant our request by laying down such rules of sobriety for the government of those whom the people have placed over them as will secure our request.

TRANSFER OF THE PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. RUSK. I ask unanimous consent to present the views of the minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in relation to House bill No. 2590, providing for the transfer of the Pension Bureau to the War Department, and move that they be printed, so that they may be in possession of the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

POSTAL CARDS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and ask that it may now be put upon its passage.

The bill (H. R. No. 2821) was received and read a first and second

The bill appropriates the sum of $62,300, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. BLOUNT. As the House will have understood from having heard the bill read, there is a deficiency of some $62,000 for the printing of postal cards. There has been an unusual demand upon the Department for them, and the supply is nearly exhausted. It will be exhausted about the 1st of April. The committee have thought it proper that the demand of the public for these cards should be met. The bill involves no expense except the cost of the paper, printing, packing, and delivery for distribution, which is about $1.39 a thousand; whereas the revenues are $10 a thousand, and they are really a source of revenue to the Government. Unless the bill is passed immediately, the manufacture will have to be stopped on the 1st day of April.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was bassed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT AND FEES OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to present, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, a report in relation to the employment of and fees paid United States attorneys and special attorneys in cases where the United States are a party, accompanied by a bill repealing section 363 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and substituting another section in lieu thereof. I desire to have the bill and the report with the exhibit marked "A" printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 2822) was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report and exhibit marked "A," ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

GOVERNMENT FOR THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs a substitute for House bill No. 1923, to prowide a government for the Indian Territory, and ask that, with the accompanying report, it may be printed and recommitted.

The substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 2823) to provide a government for the Indian Territory, was received and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill and accompanying report will be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Territories. I make this motion for this reason: The bill relates to the organization of a territorial government, and that is a matter which falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Committee on the Territories. On the 12th day of January a bill was introduced into the House for the organization of a government for the Indian Territory, and was referred to the Committee on the Territories. Since that time the committee have been considering that bill send will be ready to report that the territories. bill, and will be ready to report upon it at an early day. This bill covers precisely the same question, and it is manifestly inconsistent with the rules and the practice of the House that two committees should be considering identically the same subject at the same time. And I say further, so far as my knowledge extends and so far as I have been able to learn, there never has been a question of an organization of a Territory since the establishment of the Committee on the Territories that has not been in the exclusive control and jurisdiction of that committee. I therefore make this motion, that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] will not prevail. There is a difference between the organization of Territories hitherto and this particular case. The Territory proposed to be organized by this substitute is owned almost entirely by Indians. The soil is theirs in fee simple by treaty stipulations. A peculiar case is therefore here presented, and I think most certainly is within the jurisdiction of a committee of this House which is specially charged with the consideration of Indian matters; and I cannot conceive of any principle upon which the gentleman from Ohio can claim to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Territories. Mr. SCALES. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had this mat-

Mr. SCALES. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had this matter under consideration, and after consideration determined that they had the jurisdiction of it. I suppose the same action has also been taken by the Committee on the Territories. The object is simply to test the jurisdiction.

Now we think we have the jurisdiction because this pertains to a people who are not citizens of the United States. They have always been treated as a separate and independent people. We are free to admit that if this bill pertained to any other class of people or any citizens of the United States, then perhaps it would properly belong to the Committee on Territories. I think that would be in accordance with the rules. I read the rule in relation to the Committee on Territories:

It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the

It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to dovise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents.

There is no provision there for the organization of any Territory, but, as I said, I suppose under the custom of the House they have the right to act upon and report upon bills organizing Territories. But they have not that right upon any question touching the Indians. That belongs exclusively to the Committee on Indian Affairs, in my They have been turned over to the Committee on Indian Afration to do whatever is necessary for their interest and the interest of the Government. It seems to us that the question belongs to us; but if the House decides otherwise we are willing to give it up.

The chairman of the subcommittee was instructed to report the bill to the House, and ask that it be printed and recommitted to the committee. If it be the pleasure of the House to refer it to another com-

Mr. SOUTHARD. The rule which the gentleman from North Carolina has just read provides that-

It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to devise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents.

Now, according to that rule, as I understand it, the Committee on the Territories has the exclusive and sole control of all matters relating to such means as are necessary to secure the rights and privileges of "residents and non-residents" in the Territories. Can it be pretended that these Indians are not "residents," and in addition to the Indians there are in this Territory a large number of American citizens, estimated at from fifteen to twenty thousand, whose rights are to be protected?. It is not citizens of the United States that the committee is concerned about. Under the rules, the committee are "to devise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents." There is no place for the question of citizenship.

Now, sir, it seems to me that there can be no question about the jurisdiction in this case in view of the language of that rule.

There has been no Territory organized west of the Mississippi in which the Indians were not largely interested. Look at the case of Kansas, with her numerous reservations and the many questions growing out of the rights of Indians. That case was not referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I say that in the organization of all Territories the rights of the Indians are largely concerned.

This rule, if I understand its proper interpretation, is that the Committee on the Territories shall have the exclusive privilege of determining all questions which relate to the rights and privileges of all persons, resident and non-resident, who may be within the limits of the Territory proposed to be organized.

Now, this bill which it is proposed to recommit to the Committee on Indian Affairs covers the whole question. The two committees for some time past have been delayed in the consideration of this question because of the conflict of jurisdiction. It seems to me that the House ought to settle the question of jurisdiction, and that the Committee on the Territories have exclusive control of the matter under and by virtue of the rule. No such duties are prescribed for the Committee on Indian Affairs, but it is clearly prescribed that it the Committee on Indian Aliars, but it is clearly prescribed that it shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories, and it is so admitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Scales,] to take jurisdiction of all questions relating to the organization of Territories where Indians are not interested.

Mr. GOODIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to know of the chairman of the Committee on the Territories whether any bill has been referred to that committee in relation to the organization of this Territory?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will answer the gentleman. He asks if any bill has been referred to the Committee on the Territories in relation to this subject. Early in the session, on the 12th of January, a bill on this subject was introduced by Mr. Franklin, of Missouri, and referred to this committee. The committee have considered the bill very carefully and very patiently, and will be ready to report on the measure in due time. The bill referred to the committee was for the purpose of organizing a territorial government over the Indian Territory. Subsequent to that time, and on the 9th day of March, a resolution was offered which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Indian Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of opening the Indian Territory to settlement by white men, establishing a form of government adapted to the peculiar wants of that Territory, giving to its inhabitants the rights of citizenship and homestead, and dividing the remaining lands according to the rights and equities of parties entitled thereto, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SOUTHARD. That resolution was agreed to by the House for the reason that no objection was made to it, no member of the Committee on the Territories having observed its introduction. That brings the question precisely before the House as to which committee is entitled to jurisdiction in this case, and as I said before it is man-ifestly inconsistent with the rules of the House and the proper transaction of its business that two committees should be charged with considering precisely the same subject-matter at the same time.

The Committee on the Territories has long had this question under consideration at this session of Congress, by reason of the bill which was first introduced and referred to it. I would add further that in the history of this House there has been no instance of organizing a territorial form of government that has not come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Territories since that committee was established; none to my knowledge, and I have made extensive in-quiries. Therefore the Committee on the Territories is entitled to the support of this House upon the motion which I have made to refer this bill to that committee, the subject having already been considered by it in connection with the bill first referred to it.

Let the matter not be misunderstood. This bill relates to the rights and priyileges of residents and non-residents in the Territory covered The purpose and effect of this bill are not to better govern the Indians, but to prescribe a territorial form of government over that country, to authorize the appointment of a governor, secretary of the Territory, and the providing of a territorial legislature and the other machinery of a territorial government. It is a bill in all particulars similar to those which have prescribed forms of government for other Territories. Therefore I say there can be no doubt about the scope or effect of the bill, there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Territories, which committee has always had sole and exclusive jurisdiction over such matters.

Mr. PAGE. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there can be no question as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs in reference to this bill. The bill proposes to organize the Indian Territory under a territorial form of government. There are to-day five different tribes of civilized Indians within the territory proposed to be so organized, numbering from fifty thousand to fifty-five thousand, and there are very few white men in that territory, less than two thousand, I think. Now, if the Committee on Indian Affairs has any duties at all, if there is any bill which could be referred to that committee, it seems to me that this is one that should be so referred. The Committee on Indian Affairs has had this matter under consideration for the last two months, or at least for five or six weeks. We have heard all the representatives of the Indian tribes residing within this territory. They have presented arguments pro and con, some in favor of and some against the organization of a territory there, and they have done it with marked ability. This morning the committee listened for nearly three-quarters of an hour to an argument in favor of a territorial organization.

I say again that it seems to me that if there is any matter which should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs it should be the question of organizing the Indian Territory, a territory inhabited almost exclusively by these five tribes of Indians. I find nothing in the rules that gives the control of this matter to the Committee on the Territories. I say this, however, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs: I would not have objected to the Committee on the Territories taking the consideration of this bill had it been in relation to any other Territory excepting the Indian Territory. In a case of that kind I have no doubt it would be a matter purely within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Territories. But as this is a bill for the purpose of organizing Indian territory exclusively, where there are 55,000 Indians, it seems to me that the Committee on Indian Affairs should have the sole charge of it.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me that this is not the proper time to raise the question between the committees of the jurisdiction of this subject. This bill, with the accompanying report, comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who ask that it be printed and recommitted to them. This bill was referred by the House to the Committee on Indian Affairs; by that reference it belongs to that committee, this particular bill, on which they now make their report.

More than that, by the resolution read a few moments ago at the Clerk's desk, this House directed the Committee on Indian Affairs to examine into and report to the House upon this very subject. Now, whatever question may arise as to which committee shall finally report a bill for action to this House, it seems to me that courtesy requires that the House shall permit this committee to have its bill printed, to have its report printed, and that another committee shall not be allowed to stand by and take the report of the committee which has been carefully prepared, and as soon as prepared, have it transferred to them for their benefit.

I make these remarks in behalf of all the committees of this House who spend their time and give their labor to investigating the several subjects committed to them. They should be allowed the right to have their reports printed and recommitted to them—to the committee making the report, and not to another committee. When the question arises as to the jurisdiction of one of two committees to present a proper bill to the House for action, that subject can be then considered. But I do protest against taking from a committee, even before it has been printed, a bill referred to them and the report which they have made upon it, and transfer them to another commit-tee, which, so far as that report is concerned, has done nothing at all in regard to it

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say simply a word upon the proposition presented to the consideration of this House by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.] It seems to me that this subject-matter necessarily and properly pertains to the Committee on Indian Affairs, for the reason that prime among the subjects and objects of that committee is the making provision for taking care of the interests of the Indians. If this was simply a proposition to organize an ordinary territorial government with a homogeneous American population resident in the territory, it would be very proper and right and seemly that the Committee on Territories should have exclusive jurisdiction of the subject.

But inasmuch as the question of governing the Indians by constructing a territorial form of government for them is a question sui generis, and not like that referred to by the gentleman from Ohio in regard to organizing a territory of homogeneous American popula-tion with a view to final admission as a State, I think there can be no question as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs over this bill. It is very well known to the House that in this Indian Territory there are various tribes of Indians, differing in numbers, differing in the legislation which prevails in their respective councils, and differing in their right of representation in their local legislatures. It therefore presents a very peculiar question, and not one such as is ordinarily presented to the consideration of the House upon a proposition to organize a territorial government upon the showing that a certain territory possesses the requisite amount of population. The primary question is whether the government for the Indians should be a government like that to which we would subject an ordinary territory consisting of American citizens; and this is a very dif-ferent question from that usually presented with reference to the organization of a territorial government.

This question has been elaborately considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. A very large amount of proof has been taken pro and con. Quite a number of gentlemen distinguished for their fidelity to the Indians-many of them Indians themselves, some of the whole blood and some of the half-blood—have been before this committee and have expressed their opinions with reference to the question both orally and in writing. It is well known that a difference of opinion exists among prominent and intelligent men of the Indian tribes themselves and those who thoroughly understand their interests as to the policy of organizing the Indians into a territorial form of government. Some conceive that the Indians have arrived at such a point of intelligence with reference to their own affairs and their own interests and the protection of their own rights as to fit them to be organized under a territorial form of government, looking finally to their admission into the Union. But it must be remembered that there are five nations of civilized tribes in this territory, while there are others who cannot probably be so classed. All these interests being involved, the ques-probably be so classed. All these interests being involved, the question as to their representation in a territorial government is a subject which properly pertains to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

In answer to the remark of my friend from Ohio, [Mr SOUTHARD,] that the rules of the House give authority over this subject to the Committee on Territories and that no rule gives it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I may very properly say that the other day, when the Committee on Appropriations, presided over with so much ability by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] which seems to draw to itself almost every subject and topic of legislation that can be presented for the consideration of the House—when that commits be presented for the consideration of the House—when that commit-tee reported the other day in the general appropriation bill a proposi-tion to transfer the Iudian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department, they were, in my humble judgment, treffching upon the functions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who, though their special duties have not been defined under the rules, have confided to their hands the great questions of the interests and management of the Indians and the proper mode of carrying out the faith of the Government as expressed in the treaties with the various Indian tribes. The Committee on Appropriations, I say, undertook to handle that question to the exclusion, in my judgment, of the committee to which it properly pertains.

And now, when a bill has been reported, when proof has been taken and presented to the House, and leave asked to print it and recommit it for further consideration of the committee who have already had the subject under examination, the proposition is made by a gentle-man from the Committee on the Territories to take this subject from the consideration of the committee who have spent days and weeks and months in the investigation of the question with regard to the interests of these people, whom the plighted faith of the nation requires us to guard and protect quite as much as the favored "wards" who are so often referred to in this House as constituting the subjects of the nation's peculiar guardianship.

After this committee has considered this question laboriously for weeks and months, has reported to the House a bill with accompanying proof, and asked that it be printed and recommitted for further consideration, I do not think the House will consent to take this matter from the committee to which properly pertain the management and control of this question and transfer it to the Committee on Territories, whose functions are simply to present bills for the organization of Territories where the population is homogeneous, not where it is sui generis, as is the case with the Indians.

When the Indian Committee shall have passed upon this question, with all the proof it has taken and all the lights before it, it may conclude that a certain form of government ought to exist. But it conclude that a certain form of government ought to exist. But it cannot be supposed that an ordinary territorial form of government would be adapted to the condition, the wants, the necessities, and the respective rights of these various Indian tribes. Why? For the simple and obvious reason that, if in the Indian Territory you organize a territorial government in the ordinary form and manner, the control of that government will in a few years be possessed, necessarily in a large degree, by those who are not Indians. This, in my view, would be the effect of the organization of a territorial government in the ordinary form for the Indian Territory.

For these reasons I agree with my colleague on the committee in the motion he has made to refer this question to the Committee on Indian whom it has long been considered.

Mr. WILSHIRE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word with reference to the duties assigned to the Committee on the Territories. I do not agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] in the construction of the rule on this subject. That rule provides that—

It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to devise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents.

I submit, sir, that by any proper rule of construction the assignment of this duty to that committee presupposes an existing government of the Territory before this committee can lay their hands upon the subject or exercise any jurisdiction. But whether that be so or not, the peculiar condition of the Indians inhabiting the Territory now sought to be organized renders it an especially appropriate subject for the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire first whether there should be any territorial government organized at all. Why? Because, if the Committee on the Territories will refer to the several treaties with these tribes, it will be found that they have accorded to them in fee-simple the right to the soil so long as they preserve their tribal relations. And more, they have the right to local self-government guaranteed to them by those treaties forever.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSHIRE. I cannot be interrupted. I submit to this House that state of facts itself raises a question that addresses itself par-ticularly to the Committee on Indian Affairs and should be consid-ered by that committee and passed upon before any other committee of this House should take cognizance of the subject. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.]

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, the question how this Territory shall be organized must of course depend upon the question whether it shall be organized at all, and the question whether it shall be organized. ized at all depends primarily upon the wish of the Indians themselves and upon actual treaty stipulation with those Indians themselves and upon actual treaty stipulation with those Indians. And if that is not a question which primarily, and properly, and exclusively belongs to the Indian Committee for consideration, I do not know what question does. If it does not, it is about time I think the Indian Committee was entirely abolished. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Let us have a moment's further explanation; there have been three speeches on that side.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on his demand for the previous question?

revious question? Mr. SEELYE. I do.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The question first recurred on Mr. Southard's motion to refer to ne Committee on the Territories; which was disagreed to.

The bill and the accompanying report were then ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSHIRE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and eport were recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTEST AGAINST REMOVAL OF DUTY ON IRON.

Mr. COCHRANE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the memorial of a number of iron-manufacturers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, protesting against the removal of the present duty on iron, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD; and, as there are but a few names attached, the names also be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON. How many names are there?

Mr. COCHRANE. There are only a few names, but if objection be made let it be printed without the names.

Mr. KASSON. I object, as the RECORD is already becoming too much encumbered by including matter which does not properly belong to it.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection in this case, as the memorial is exceedingly short, containing only two pergraphs.

wo paragraphs. Mr. KASSON. I understood it was to be printed with the names.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have withdrawn that portion in reference to the name

Mr. KASSON. If that be withdrawn and the memorial is short, I withdraw my objection; but I insist the principle is a wrong one.

The memorial was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows, without the

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

gress assembled:

The petition of the undersigned, workingmen in the Star Iron-Works, in the county of Allegheny and State of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents that we have observed with alarm and indignation the introduction into Congress of a scheme for tariff reduction, prepared, as we believe, not by members of Congress, for the benefit of this country and its inhabitants, but by adherents of other nations, for the benefit of foreigners. We submit to your wise consideration the following facts: First. Under substantially the existing system of revenue from imports not only the manufactures but the general wealth and prosperity of this country have advanced at an unprecedented rate during the past lifteen years; manufactured goods of all sorts are more abundantly and cheaply produced here than ever before, and the industrial independence of this country is more nearly achieved. Second. In the depression of industry now prevailing all over the world the manufacturing population of this country are bearing their share of the common adversity with resolution, and are endeavoring with all their power to make use of this period by improving and cheapening their processes, trusting when better times arrive to serve their fellow-citizens even better than hitherto. Third, This attitude of patient endurance and partially-suspended vitality would in many quarters speedily give place to despair and ruin if the changes proposed in the bill now before the Committee of Ways and Means shall be enacted into a law.

We respectfully petition your honorable bodies to leave the tariff laws undisturbed for the present, and, when alterations are made therein, at a more favorable time, to take counsel from your own countrymen and constituents, rather than from the industrial and commercial enemies of your country.

II. G. BOARDMAN.

Mr. COCHRANE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the bill (H. R. No. 675) for the relief of H. G. Boardman, postmaster at Milton, Vermont; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMBOAT PARAGON.

Mr. COCHRANE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2824) to change the name of the steamboat Paragon of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2825) to correct errors and supply omission, in the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

PETER WRIGHT & SONS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2826) to refund and remit certain duties to Peter Wright & Sons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with a resolution of the House passed the other day, the Chair announces the following additional members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department: Mr. Stenger, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Hooker, of Mississippi; Mr. Savage, of Ohio; and Mr. Wilson, of Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the regular order.
Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without having a morning hour?

Mr. BRIGHT. I thought the morning hour had expired. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the morning hour begins at one o'elock and ten minutes, and the business in order is the calling of committees for reports of a private nature. The call begins with the Committee on Patents.

STEPHEN HULL.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2827) for the relief of Stephen Hull; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, in its preamble, recites that a patent for an improvement in harvesters was granted to Stephen Hull, which bears date September 14, 1869, and which, without any fault or negligence on his part, was not issued to him by the Commissioner of Patents till the 20th was not issued to him by the Commissioner of Patents till the 20th day of January, 1876; and the bill declares that said patent shall continue in force for the term of seventeen years from the said 20th day of January, 1876; provided that no person shall be liable to an action for any infringement of said patent which was done or committed previous to the said 20th day of January, 1876.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read. The committee state that on the 14th day of September, 1869, a patent was granted to Stephen Hull for an improvement in harvesters, to continue in force for seventeen years; that this patent was withheld from the patentee by the arbitrary act of the then Commissioner of Patents for more than six years and four of the then Commissioner of Patents for more than six years and four months, which arbitrary act is now conceded by the present head of the Office to have been wholly illegal and unjust. The reason given for not delivering the patent was that the patentee had neglected cerfor not delivering the patent was that the patentee had neglected certain requirements of the Office, but Commissioner Duell, in a decision rendered January 4, 1876, says: "After a careful consideration of all the facts and the law applicable to this case, I am convinced that the alleged laches of the applicant consist entirely in the delays imposed by the action of the Office, and for which the Office was solely responsible." The patentee claims, and justly, the committee think, that he should not be deprived of the enjoyment of his patent for the time that it was withedless. that it was withheld, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, which declares that said patent shall continue in force for seventeen years from January 20, 1876, the date when said letters-patent were delivered.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. It will be understood by the House from the reading of the report that this bill is not for an extension of a patent.

The case, which is fairly presented I think in the report is this: The patentee applied in 1869 for a patent for an improvement in harvesters. The papers were drawn and the patent was granted. But before the delivery of it the Commissioner ascertained or thought that there was something imperfect in the application, and therefore withheld the patent. Upwards of six years passed away, and Commissioner Fisher, who was the acting Commissioner, retired from office, and Commissioner Duell came into the place. The patentee then applied to Commissioner Duell, and Commissioner Duell upon an examination of the case decided that by the arbitrary act of the Patent Office the patent was withheld from the patentee. He nowasks Congress to permit his patent to run from the 20th day of last January, when he came into possession of it. That is the substance of the case. The committee think it is a very proper and just case, and ask the House to decide upon it favorably. It is not an extension of a patent at all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the matien to according to the being the second and the second the second transfer of the was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN STAINTHORPE.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY also, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the memorial of John Stainthorpe, and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the report may also be printed in the

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The report is as follows:

The petition of John Stainthorpe recites "that some time before the 6th March, 1855, he invented an improvement in machinery for molding candles which was not before known or used, and that he obtained letters-patent for his said invention dated 6th March, 1855, for fourteen years, which patent was extended for seven years." The patent therefore, after a life of twenty-one years, expired March 6, 1876.

Your committee, after a careful investigation, find the facts in accordance with the above statement, with the exception that a machine was used in England previous to the issue of this patent possessing some of the characteristics of the Stainthorpe machine. The possession of the letters-patent by the said Stainthorpe is, however, evidence sufficient to the committee that he had a right to what he claimed as his invention. The invention is of great value to manufacturers and to the public, reducing the amount of labor in a very great degree, producing candles many-fold faster than by the old method, and thereby of necessity reducing the cost of the article. The committee have no hesitation in saying that this inventor is entitled to great credit for his ingenuity. Mr. Stainthorpe, like many others of his craft, labored under the disadvantage of poverty, and was unable for the first fourteen years to realize much profit. It is not, however, in evidence that he was a loser, but, on the contrary, it seems he did receive a small compensation. After obtaining the extension Stainthorpe sold to parties in New Bedford, Massachusetts, his right in the patent for $14,000. The patent has since been held as a monopoly, particularly in the manufacture of paraftine candles, the licensees being restricted from making that particular article. The result of the extension asked for will be to again place the patent in the possession of the present owners, Stainthorpe receiving as a consideration $11,000, according to a contract already drawn and which the parties in interests. ## ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

vate Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that, according to order, the House go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. RICE. This is regular private-bill day—objection day; we insist that the regular order be maintained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The Chair will state that yesterday afternoon the House made a special order that after the morning hour to-day the House would go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill. That is now the business in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I make that motion.
Mr. RICE. My motion was made first. I do not withdraw it.
Mr. RANDALL. It requires unanimous consent to supersede the agreement made yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is right.

Mr. HURLBUT. The order of the House is of record. I ask that it be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for, which is that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] will take the chair.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial expressions the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial expressions the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and general debate will terminate in one hour. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hurlbut] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be the custom of the House on bills of this nature to allow the most unbounded latitude of discussion, and I propose to avail myself of the time allowed me to pass in review certain questions which, in my judgment, are of paramount importance to the peace, good order, and harmony of this nation, and I do it in reply to the long line of argument, assault, and invective which has been poured upon the republican party, its conduct and management, commencing with the thundering harangue of the gentleman from the highlands of Georgia [Mr. HILL] and ending with the good natural assaults and the gentleman from the highlands of Georgia [Mr. HILL] and ending the gentleman from the highlands of Georgia [Mr. Hill] and ending with the good-natured scolding of the gentleman from the lowlands of North Carolina, [Mr. Yeates.]

There are questions that rarely come into this House, for the reason that the Representatives of the people are not as a general rule up to the requirements of their own position. The rank and file of this country—the thinking, working, voting, fighting men—are as a rule, on this question, in advance of their Representatives. Now, sir, whad here in the speech of the gentleman from Georgia on the amnesty bill one of the most astonishing parodies I have ever happened to hear upon the beautiful parable of the prodigal son. I do not know any particular in which the prodigal son of Scripture had not the advantage over the gentleman from Georgia and those who are united with him in his movement. The prodigal asked the consent of his father. He asked for the share that belonged to him; he took it by father. He asked for the share that belonged to min, he took as gift. These gentlemen did not ask; they took. The parallel runs gill. These gentlemen did not ask; they took. The parallel runs along very well in the next matter; they both went off into far countries and "wasted their substance in riotous living." But, sir, the next feature in the case is wholly to the advantage of the prodigal of the Scripture, because he "came to himself." That is what these gentlemen have never done. Away off in that far country, in the misery to which he was reduced by his own unwise and wrongful act, the prodigal "came to himself;" and he remembered his father's

There was something strangely amusing in the pretense vauntingly set out by the gentleman from Georgia that he had come back to his father's house. The trouble with him was he would not come. We sent for him all sorts of messages, but he would not come; and from that time to this no man has ever heard from his lips, or any of those who train with him, those words of penitence which came from the back of the medical came and which cained him recognition. broken heart of the prodigal son and which gained him reconcilia-tion and re-admission to his father's house.

All along in all these debates there has been a constant assertion that no wrong had ever been done, that the rebellion in itself was a right thing, that they were obeying the higher law in attempting to break down this country. And they wonder now, to judge from the speeches I have heard lately, how it is that the American people do not trust them as frankly, as completely, as absolutely as they would men who had never sinned.

There is no use, Mr. Chairman, of mineing matters as to plain facts. There exists a division to this day in the public sentiment of this country as marked and distinct as it existed in 1864 and 1865. That distinction is between those who believed then and still believe that levying war against the United States was treason and crime and the men who did not so believe then and do not so believe now. That distinction is irreconcilable and it is one on principle. I have neither the time nor the disposition to deal with individual men. I propose to address myself to this question of the division upon principle that exists in this country.

I assume, sir, that nine-tenths of those men who went into the rebellion in 1861 went because they believed they were right and believed all they said. They argued the question before their people broadly and strongly as to the right. Nor have I ever heard any man who went into that movement who did not justify it at the time it was done and insisted it was the only thing freemen could do. The literature of that time has not perished yet from the memory of men. There are here in this House, as there are everywhere, men who, by voice and by vote, by eloquence and by argument, by reason, by appeals to passion, by every means which could carry the public mind, urged their people to that fatal measure of secession and war, and so far as I know no man has ever taken back those arguments. They urged that this Government of the United States in 1860-761 was a tyranny so bad, that no free, self-respecting man could afford to stay in it. They alleged that to remain in that same old Government of ours would be to confess themselves slaves, and slaves of most unworthy nasters. And, sir, the people were swept away by that doctrine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was logic in this thing. I can remember perfectly when nullification was trampled out under the armed heel of the last democratic President who ever stood by the nation. I can recollect when that attempt failed there was deliberately organized all over the southern country—deliberately carried into effect the means for sweeping, changing, controlling the whole public mind of that country; and those means did not fail. Then it was especially that this same doctrine of the right of secession, resting on the right of State sovereignty, was spread and taught everywhere. Then, as the best and wisest of all men I knew in that country wrote to me in "every avenue by which the hearts and intellects of the people can be reached has been perverted; the pulpit, the bench, the bar, the press, the school, the universi ies, have all been debauched with this doctrine.

And, sir, the logic of the men who prepared that doctrine is just as inexorable as any human logic can be. It is as accurate, as close, as complete as the Calvinistic doctrine of the five points: given original sin, and you come to universal damnation; given State sovereignty, and you come to secession and rebellion. [Laughter.]

This same doctrine, I am sorry to say, has been repeated here on this floor, and there is logic in that, because, if the doctrine of State sovereignty be true they these gentlemen, who in our conjuice and this floor, and there is logic in that, because, if the doctrine of State sovereignty be true, then these gentlemen, who, in our opinion and under the Constitution and laws, committed treason, committed no crime. The doctrine of extreme State sovereignty justifies any citizen of a State in following that State against the Union; and hence it is repeated and brought in here, as in the very able and logical speech of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker,] because it is the only shield in the world against the fixing upon each man who took part in the rebellion the crime of treason and the name of traitor. But sir it is a pertipant inquiry and it is one that is asked by

But, sir, it is a pertinent inquiry, and it is one that is asked by thousands upon thousands of thinking men throughout the country. If it be true that, in all honesty and all fair dealing, believing the thing to be right, the men who inaugurated and carried on secession and rebellion were in 1861 honest in their hatred to the Union, their assertions of independence, and determination not to remain in the Union, the question arises, what has the nation done to them since to win back their affection? What justification is to be given for this

ple, and it is a question entitled to an answer.

Let us look at the facts of history, and I allude to them with no vindictive spirit. The war came, and then what followed? Army after army penetrated into the vast fields of the South, and whereever an army goes destruction follows; for, sir, there is nothing on earth that is so complete an instrument of destruction as an army. What followed? Losses of life innumerable, captures of cities, storming of towns.

Now, sir, not here, or anywhere, have I failed, or will I ever fail, to render to the men who met us in the field the tribute which is their due for the splendid manhood with which they fought out their cause. That is true and it is honorable, and it is American, and it belongs to me as well as it does to them. But, sir, in the end all this resistance failed. From mere weariness, exhaustion, and inability, the arms fell from hands that could no longer hold them. Was the defeat on the field the wearing out of their armies? Was that one of the tender ways in which the United States has won back this lost allegiance and this lost laye? and this lost love?

But it did not stop there. During the war, and as a war measure, the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States declared freedom to a vast class of persons who had up to that time been called slaves and held as such. Look back at the records of that time. I read here in the debates of Congress many very interesting remarks of gentlemen then and now in the opposition, likening that order of the President to the Pope's bull against the comet, declaring it to be a mere brutum fulmen. But it did not so turn out. Large masses of these men wherever the armies went became free.

What else? When the war was over, the first among the chief things done was the preparation and passage of an amendment de-claring this whole class that had previously been property to be men, and at one single blow $400,000,000 of the best and most valuable property of the South were annihilated. Is it by that "confiscation," as they call it, that the love, the alienated affections, of the former slaveholders were won back? But, sir, it did not stop there. The inexorable logic of events drove this nation not only into the assertion of the manhood of the slave, but into the assertion of his civil and political rights; and the prejudices of two centuries were struck to the roots; the long inheritance of the sense of dominion and mastery was shocked to the last extreme; and without any preparation two races of men, of whom the one had been master in the fullest sense of dominion and the other had been slave in the most abject of all servitudes are brought face to face upon the theater of our Southern States, upon the common right of equal manhood and equal citizenhood. Is that which so shocks the heart, the feeling, the prejudice, the passions of the whole population down there—is that one of the means by which the affections that gush in such brave words upon this floor were won back? No, sir. We cannot truly say as a matter of fact that this nation was eminently magnanimous to those who revolted. Whether the nation intended it or not, no more severe, no more crushing, no more continual punishment could have been inflicted than has been inflicted under those amendments. And, sir, it is so felt and ecognized at the South to-day.

Few men, even of the most cautious minds, hesitate to say that the reconstruction amendments are a failure and a curse to the country, and the baser and more violent sort hesitate at no steps to make them barren and fruitless of results.

Now, sir, the plain people in my country know all these facts. You cannot answer them by any well-constructed and rhetorical discourses over dead statesmen, whose lives you made bitter while they lived. Nor can you answer them by loving appeals to the Constitution, which the gentleman from Georgia says he carried off, like other defaulting partners who ran away carrying off the goods of the partnership, and are brought back by blue-coated policemen by the nape of the neck. No assertion merely of unreasonable and unwonted affection is going to change the deliberate, well-considered, solid, substantial opinion of the people of this nation; and by the people of this nation I mean the men who think, who act, who fought, who work, who vote. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Yeates] gave utterance yesterday to a sentiment which I have no doubt is true. He said that the South had come back, come back united with the democracy. Well, sir, the unconverted South ought to be united with the northern That is the place for it. Why not? These very things democracy. That is the place for it. Why not: These very things of which they complain, these amendments to the Constitution each and every one of them were passed in this House, in the State conventions, and in the Legislatures against the will, against the protest, and against the argument of the then existing democracy. There is and against the argument of the then existing democracy. There is not a statesman in the democratic party in the North that I know of who has not on the record to-day his settled opinion not only that these amendments never ought to have been put into the Constitution, but that they never were in fact legally and constitutionally

Now, sir, whether they are doing the democracy any good or not is entirely another thing. Whether it may not be that the taint, if I may call it so, the suspicion which in the popular mind attaches to men who have within the last ten years occupied the place which they have done—whether that taint will not affect in the public mind the men whom they have voluntarily claimed and who claim them as callies is a capacitor to be determined by allies, is a question to be determined hereafter.

There is another terrible mistake which seems to prevail among the members of this House. There seems to be an impression as if the republican party of the United States were on trial. Well, it is on trial, as every other organization which wields power is, before the people; but the real party which is now standing the crucial test is this very majority in this present House. The calm, incorruptible scrutiny of the American people rests upon you to know whether you have the competency and the will to carry out those great reforms to which you affirm yourselves to be pledged. The trial works both ways. The great tribunal before which we are to be tried is the American people, and the American people are governed as all other people are by reason, by sentiment, by affection, and perhaps by prejudice. But, unless it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the thoughtful men of this country that there is better hope for the future prosperity, future unity, and future greatness of this country in the hands of the holy or unholy alliance of which the gentleman from North Carolina talked yesterday, rather than in the hands where it rests now, you need not expect any special change.

Sir, there are undoubtedly here a great many men on the other side of the House who have come into this House by the regular expression of the political opinions of the districts which send them; so also there are a great many men who are the spasmodic result of a certain hysterical affection of the body-politic, the result of some shock or disgust, and the trial is working now. The demonstration to be made is that you are more competent, more true to the Union, more true to its real interests, more true to its undeniable rights and to its future destinies than those who have had it in charge so long; and that sort of thing cannot be met by any petty line of business; it cannot be met by any flinging of mud. It has got to be met by demonstration of purpose, heart, and ability, and that is where this majority is now being tried. You cannot meet the demands of the people as you propose to do it in this bill by a rash, sweeping, cutting off of expenditures without any reason, or by simply asserting without any proof that the Departments of the Government are overloaded, or by cutting down the poor clerks from their monthly pittance. The American people are not poor. These gentlemen opposite, and especially the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who represents, I believe, all the wealth of Wall street, have no right to talk about the American people being poor. They never have been, and they never will be too poor to pay a fair and competent price for the labor they ask from their public servants.

But, sir, the question which overrides all others in this matter is the question of the maintenance and perpetuity of this nation. That is the real thing. With this doctrine of secession asserted here again upon this floor and argued elaborately, with the declaration that we are not a nation, with the assumption that we are but a loose confederacy of States, all men see an attempt to roll back the whole current of events, to set aside all the great fruits of the struggle the country has gone through; and I warn gentlemen here now that the most prominent sentiment in these United States to-day is nationality and the perpetuity of the country. And the man or men, the party or parties, that either run against it or that even indicate that they shudder from coming up to the full requisition of that demand, are doomed.

Now, sir, I for one desire the establishment of absolute peace, absolute order, perfect good-will all over this country; but I do not expect it to come from resolutions nor from speeches. I expect it to come in the only way in which it can come—by action. I expect the judgment and conscience and feelings of the great conquering, victorious portion of this nation in the late struggle to be satisfied by the acts of those who now are restored to the Union. Those acts are of a nature so plain, so manifest, so clear, that they will be satisfied with nothing else, for, sir, the people of these United States—and I mean by the people of the United States that mass of brain and bone and muscle which saved the country in its hour of peril and which defends the country now—that mass of mind and brain and muscle will not be satisfied with anything but the fruition of that for which they fought. They have accepted, sir, as full payment for all that they have done and suffered, the complete enforcement of the three great amendments to the Constitution. They receive them as payment for the services which they have rendered; they receive them as the reward and the result of the great war. They receive them as the reward and the result of the great war. They receive them in payment for their empty hearthstones and their crowded graveyards. And whenever it appears that in any part of this country there exist combinations by which the rights secured under these amendments are either violently or fraudently defeated, it touches the tenderest spot in the sensibilities of the people of this country.

Unless throughout this nation there shall be no differences between citizens; unless it shall be absolutely lawful and absolutely secure for any man anywhere under this flag to speak and act and vote just precisely as he likes; until that consummation has been reached, this cause of irritation and trouble will remain.

Mr. Chairman, every man knows that in all these things that I have said, or in what I may say, I am governed by no sense of personal bitterness. There is probably no man who stands upon this floor upon this side of the House who has such close relations by blood and kindred with the Southern States as I have. Some of the very leading spirits who assisted in seducing the people from their allegiance are among those who are bound to me by ties of kindred. I believe they were honest and earnest in what they did, but the cause for which they worked, the end which they sought to bring about, was, in my judgment and in the judgment of the people of these United States, the most criminal for which men ever combined together. To strike at the life of a man is but to extinguish a single existence, but to strike at the life of the nation is to arrest the entire progress of civilization, to roll back the current of progress, and to cast us all adrift again upon a see without compass and without chart, and so the people have considered it.

It was said of old, Whether is the greater, the gift or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? What is there that a man values more highly than he values his life? And yet innumerable lives were freely offered up, sons given by their mothers, husbands parted from their wives, and their lives offered up on the altar of their country. It is by the price which we pay for things, or are willing to pay for them, that we value them. And we recognize the price that has been paid; we recognize that that price is one that cannot be afforded to be paid again in a generation, scarcely in the life-time of any nation. It is a full, complete, satisfactory price. And the reward that is claimed for it is not that men shall join in adopting resolutions, but that they shall recognize the dominion of the law; that they shall recognize that violence is not a mode to be applied among a nation of freemen to control elections.

When these thinge shall come to pass, when it shall come to pass in this country that everywhere throughout this nation the rights of all men, black and white and of all the intermediate shades, shall be recognized fully, completely, and absolutely, then there will be peace. But that peace never can come as long as men who themselves have been active in the original promulgation of this doctrine stand up before the American people asserting that same dangerous, suicidal, ruinous doctrine of extreme State sovereignty and the right of secession. Two-thirds of all the thinking men in this nation to-day have been educated up to this point: that they can raise their bold foreheads up to the blue sky that hangs over them, recognizing but the one flag of their country, and say in all honesty and pride: "Above us there is nothing but the nation; above the nation there is nothing but God."

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] the remainder of my time, der of my time.

Mr. KASSON. In approaching the consideration of this legislative appropriation bill, I feel that many in this House as well as myself must be embarrassed by two distinguishing facts that continually present themselves. The first is that the political situation of the House itself in relation to the General Government is peculiar. Very rarely does it happen in our history that the majority of the House of Representatives is antagonistic to the Administration of the country. In other countries having a responsible government it so happens that the administration changes with the majority of the popular branch of the legislative body. Here our Constitution provides for a different system; and hence it is possible, and to-day it is actual, that a majority of the body that originates appropriation bills is in political antagonism to the Administration charged with the function of executing the laws. This is the first difficulty.

And gentlemen of the majority will see, as clearly we do, that in the eyes of the country it subjects them to the suspicion, unless they act with great prudence and discretion, that they strike heavier blows in the reduction of appropriations at the Administration of the National Government than they would do if they were in political harmony with that Administration. I beg to submit that thought to their consideration, and to take to myself also the proper consideration that the minority, being in harmony with the Administration, may possibly have such sympathy with it as not to be willing to go quite far enough. I propose to ascertain whether there may be some ground upon which the careful, prudent men of the majority of this House and of the minority may combine in the consideration of this bill.

The second fact is that the civil service in our country, which is so seriously struck at by this bill, is upon a different basis from that of any other country in the civilized world, I believe, whether under monarchical or republican administration. In no other country within my knowledge, and I have had actual contact with the civil force of several different nations—in no other country does the mass of the civil service in its personal composition depend upon the political complexion of the body making the appropriations. It does not even depend upon the political complexion of the administrative department. And the struggle of the true republicans and reformers in the United States to-day is to put our civil service upon a more permanent footing, to make attachment to the Constitution, obedience to the laws, integrity of character, and fitness for the office the leading characteristics and qualifications; and then, as long as they are faithful in the discharge of their duties in all the minor employments of the Government, to let them remain in office.

I submit that gentlemen on both sides of the House who seek the good of the nation will unite with me in the hope that at some time, not too long postponed, we may agree that the first question to be put to a candidate for a subordinate position under this Government shall not be to what political party do you belong? but shall relate to his fidelity to the Constitution, his observance of the laws, his honesty, and his fitness for the functions proposed to be assumed by him. Let me say that I am myself endeavoring to mature a bill upon these principles, and will present it to the House as early as I may be able to do so.

Then there is one other trouble in coming to the consideration of this bill in addition to those I have mentioned. That is, that the Committee on Appropriations, through its leading members, have not made it comfortable for those who dissent from their propositions to offer and support any amendment, no matter how carefully drawn, which shall propose any change in their bill. On the contrary, they have chosen hitherto in the main to insist that their propositions shall be supported in such a way as to shut out from fair consideration propositions for amendment coming from either side of the House. Owing to the views I entertain touching some of the provisions of this bill, I must appeal to the majority of this House whether it is not for the interest of the whole country that their minds shall be open to the reasons presented for some amendments to this bill, whatever side of the House they may come from, in order that we may arrive at correct results?

With these preliminary observations, and remembering the short time allowed me to direct the attention of the House to the provisions of the bill, let me proceed to apply what I have said to some of these clauses. The committee by this bill raise the question of compensation, beginning with the President of the United States and extending almost to the least of the appointees of the Government, coming down to $1,200, where they stop. Is this proposition wise and right? Gentlemen know very well my position in the last Congress touching the compensation of members of the House and the Senate. Those who were members of the Forty-third Congress know well that I endeavored, as did the majority of the House, to comply heartily and frankly with the demand of the country, which I believed right, in the reduction of those salaries to the former standard. This committee have raised the question, shall we go further? Shall we go beyond what the Forty-third Congress did, and again raise the question then settled to the satisfaction of the country.

If the proposition be to make a sweeping, horizontal reduction of all salaries, the committee is nearly right. If, on the contrary, the action of the committee should have been directed to a discriminating consideration of those salaries which were too high with reference to the permanent wants of the Government and of the country, then the question is open to consideration and the bill should be amended. I have only to say that a thousand times sooner will I strike our own salaries down to the figures which prevailed prior to 1860, down to $3,000, than touch the poorly paid laborious employés of your Departments living only upon salaries which have pertained to their positions for nearly thirty years. If you are going to strike these poor employés who now barely pay their yearly bills, let us strike down our own pay so that it will barely meet our yearly bills, living here in Washington in the humblest manner consistent with self-respect.

The committee have re-opened the whole question by the manner in which they have presented it to us; and I feel that my own self-respect will not allow me to receive $4,500 if I am not willing to allow the laborious clerk to receive for the service which he renders the Government his $1,400 or $1,600 or $1,800—salaries fixed before there was any depreciation in the currency of the country, or increase in the expenses of living, when rents in the city of Washington were nearly one-half what they are now.

Sir, if all the members of this House would take the trouble to acquaint themselves, as well as others of us who have been here longer, with the actual impossibility of these poor employés living on these reduced salaries and properly supporting and educating their families, they would at once put their hands upon those clauses of the bill and say, "You shall not touch those old-established salaries that have stood for over twenty years without being increased." If you strike at the salaries which were increased in consequence of the increased cost of living and the diminished value of the circulating money, then you are right. On that principle we on this side will work with you heartily and put them down to the least limit consistent with the employment of proper men and the decent support of human life here in this city.

What then will you do? Will you entertain an amendment that shall nullify those clauses of the bill that affect the old salaries that have stood in old times, salaries fixed when the political majority was different and never since changed, and limit your reduction to those that have been increased, or will you assent to the whole proposition of the committee and strike down all salaries irrespective of their relation to the necessary scale of expenditure or the responsibility of the office? Of course when these principles come to be applied, gentlemen must be prepared upon the very brief debate allowed on these mestions to come to some intelligent and proper opinions.

Now let me call attention to the two Departments with which I am most familiar; and the House will pardon me for saying that as to one of them, having once served in a post that rendered me familiar with every branch of that Department, I cannot see how this House can support the provisions of this bill. You will observe that there are some Departments of the Government whose labors have been largely increased during and at the close of the war, and whose labors have since been diminished. There we have been cutting down continually, and we ought to continue to cut down as the work diminishes. But there are some Departments of the Government where the work has increased in consequence of the termination of the civil war, where in the growth of the country increase of labor has necessarily resulted. There your theory of cutting down by a horizontal percentage cannot apply.

The Post-Office Department is one to which I refer more particularly now. During the civil war the post-offices throughout the Southern States had no administration from Washington. Since the close of that war those post-offices are restored. With every increase of settlement in the Territories and the Western States the labors of that Department increase, and in connection therewith the duties of the Sixth Auditor's Office of the Treasury. Do not gentlemen see, in contrast with certain Auditors connected with the Treasury and having charge of war expenditures, that while the duties of the latter are diminished and you may cut down the clerks in those offices, you cannot apply your 20 per cent. or any other percentage of reduction to the Post-Office Department without striking immediately at the ability of the Department to perform the public business.

The Post-Office Department, which by this bill is reduced in its force I think some eighty in number, is a Department which I submit to the House you cannot strike at to that extent without striking directly at the proper administration of the postal system and the proper work of that Department.

Then take the State Department, with which also, having been formerly charged in the Committee on Appropriations with some portions of its business, I have become familiar. You destroy in this bill the entire system of organization effected by the present Secretary and approved by a former Congress.

When he came to that Office, Mr. Chairman, there was much confusion among all its papers and many defects in its system, partly owing to want of time in former administrations to systematize and arrange them, partly owing to the fact that the former Secretary, Mr. Seward, who was as we all know a very able man, had no time to attend to such details in his Department. The present Secretary, I submit to this House, has manifested a power of organization and of labor almost without precedent in this Department. It happens to be within my personal knowledge that there is no plowman, no artisan, between the Atlantic and Pacific who has worked as many hours per day for several years as has that Secretary. He has among other labors, by the aid of his assistants, (particularly of a former one,) entirely re-organized that Department with a view to its greater efficiency and to utilize the many historical papers on deposit there. An immense quantity of papers of the great statesmen of the country have been collected and arranged. Manuscripts reaching to hundreds of volumes have been put in order, indexed, and prepared for reference by future Secretaries through all time.

reference by future Secretaries through all time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in that organization a former Congress has allowed him three Assistant Secretaries. This bill strikes off one of them, and in doing that it destroys the distribution of labor and organization of the work under which every branch of service of that Department is now going on. I am assured and believe that in doing this you perpetrate a serious injury upon the national interest, because in this organization he has classified duties and labor according to the assimilated questions arising in our foreign relations. He has consequently perfected and educated the officers and clerks in charge of these several branches, and if you take those away you leave no persons trained to the proper discharge of their duties in their places.

I wish to say also that in that Department there are six Bureaus

I wish to say also that in that Department there are six Bureaus and a chief for each. This bill reduces them to three, and when you come to examine the functions pertaining to each Bureau, you find that you cannot combine more than two with propriety without destroying the utility of the organization. I have reason to believe two as now existing can be merged into one, reducing the number to five; but beyond that this House cannot safely go.

but beyond that this House cannot safely go.

I withhold what I have to say on the details applicable to that Department until we come to the five-minute debate. I wish only to call the attention of the House now to the fact that it is not simply retrenchment accomplished by the bill, but disorganization. It is disorganization, and as such should receive the careful consideration of this House before it shall be adopted.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the majority of this House, if left to their own judgment, will be willing to consider the amending propositions on their merits, and weigh them for the good of the country at large. I regret that all these questions should come under political bias before the House. It is strange, passing strange, that we cannot consider questions of carrying on our common Government without perpetually making some political point between the opposite sides of this House. I appeal to gentlemen when they come to the practical administration of the Government of the country to give that Government adequate means to perform its functions properly, safely, and promptly.

You say retrenchment must be made, but that declaration is a word from the mouth, empty air, unless you make it upon a principle consistent with the public good. I remarked the other day, and repeat it now, if you merely retrench, and call that reform, without a sound principle upon which your retrenchment rests, you have made an extremely imperfect bill; for you can retrench by 50 per cent., by 75 per cent.; you can retrench and leave nobody to perform the functions of Government for pay. I wish no reserve or concealment about it. Wherever you find a useless employé you may properly discharge him, and ought to do it. What I object to is, that we are attempting to do what in no other country in the world ever before has been attempted to be done. We are attempting, we who are ignorant as I am touching many of the Departments, to strike down their force without the approval of the Department, without the advice of the Department, against their representations, and in some instances, as a member of the committee stated on this floor, without consulting the responsible officers of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allotted for general debate has now expired, and the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by clauses for amendment

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I desire to submit some remarks on this bill, but as the time has expired without affording me an opportunity to do so, I wish unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD as a part of the debates.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WHITE. I also desired to submit some remarks, but as the time has expired, I also ask leave to print them in the RECORD as part of the debates.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.
Mr. KASSON. Is the reading now for information or for amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. The first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and now it is being read for amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I want the House to understand that before we go any further. Mr. HALE. Whatever may be the actual record, it is evident gentlemen did not understand the bill was being read for amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to go back and commence at the beginning and read for amendment.

Mr. WADDELL. I rise to a point of order. When is an amendment in order !

The CHAIRMAN. Amendment is in order at the conclusion of the reading of each clause of the bill.

Mr. WADDELL. What do you call a clause.
The CHAIRMAN. Each paragraph; not a section.
Mr. WADDELL. Where a period occurs?

Mr. WADDELL. The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are in order at the end of the reading of each paragraph or section.

Mr. WADDELL. The question is, what constitutes a paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the uniform usage of the committee to be to read the whole paragraph through; and the gentleman knows what a paragraph is.

The Clerk informs the Chair that there has been no order waiving the first reading of the bill in committee. Is there objection now to dispensing with the first reading of the bill at length?

Mr. HALE. Let it be on the condition that we go back to the be-

Mr. HALE. Let it be on the condition that we go back to the beginning of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree to that.

Mr. CONGER. I object to waiving the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on the reading of the whole bill?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. If he does we will lose more than an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists, there is no alternative but for the Clerk to go on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my objection.

There was no further objection, and the first reading of the bill was discovered with. dispensed with.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and the following paragraph was read:

Senate:

Senate: Senate: For compensation of Senators, $333,000; and from and after the 30th of June next the compensation of said Senators shall be $4,500 per annum.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I offer the following amendment: Strike out these words, "$4,500 per annum," and insert "$3,000 per annum; and no mileage or other allowance for stationery or otherwise shall be allowed them."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following amendment: Strike out "$4,500" and insert "$2,700."

I offer this amendment because the principle upon which the committee has acted has been a reduction of 10 per cent. upon salaries that were fixed in 1855, 1856, and 1857, and previous to 1865. The salary of a member of Congress at that time was $3,000. I desire to reserve the consistency of this democratic and reform House, and I think that if these salaries are to be reduced as proposed by the committee, it is nothing more than fair, it is entirely consistent and in entire harmony with the principles upon which the bill has been framed, to reduce our own salaries to $2,700.

Mr. RANDALL. Will you allow me to ask you a question? Why did you not propose that amendment in committee, instead of assisting in the reduction that they made of 10 per cent. on the salaries? Mr. FOSTER. I beg to say that I shall not be catechised here on this floor by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the floor, and I want to show to the House and to the country the inconsistency and the duplicity of the gentle-man from Ohio in coming in here and offering an amendment to make our salaries $2,700, when he assisted the committee in the reduc-

Mr. KASSON. I raise the point of order that proceedings in committee must not be disclosed here. Fortunately nothing requires to be said in support of it, because of the familiarity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with the rules. Nothing is better understood than

Mr. RANDALL. I am only stating what has been stated over and over again, and I have been attacked here in my absence.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a very good answer to the attack of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I have made no attack. I have stated facts.

Mr. FOSTER. You charged me with duplicity and inconsistency.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must call on members to observe the rules of debate. The rule is express that five minutes are allowed to the gentleman who proposes an amendment for speaking in support, and five minutes in opposition to it. The gentleman from Ohio offering the amendment has exhausted his five minutes, and for opposing the amendment five minutes are allowed, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has now.

Mr. RANDALL. I of course oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio. I thought that in taking 10 per cent. off the salaries throughout we should take 10 per cent. also off our own salaries. I saw and now see no other ground upon which we can stand. I there fore, of course, object to that amendment fixing the amount at $2,700, for the reason that there is no sincerity in it, in my judgment, and that the gentleman does not want it and does not expect it to be adopted. The bill fixes the salary at a point where I think it can safely rest with the approval of the country, and at a point which will enable us, in view of the rates of all commodities, to cover our will enable us, in view of the rates of all commodities, to cover our expenses with our pay.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say a word. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has seen fit to charge me with duplicity in moving this amendment. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the right of the majority of this House to control this bill. I made this motion in honest good faith, as I do everything. There is no demagogery about it, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows it.

When this question was first considered in committee the proposi-

When this question was first considered in committee the proposi-tion was made that a 10 per cent. reduction should be made all through. To that motion I agreed. But afterward, when we got into the bill, more than 10 per cent. reduction has been made. We have gone back on almost all the salaries of the employés of the Government to the time when our salaries were $3,000, and have deducted 10 per cent. And I propose to hold the majority of this House and the chairman of this committee, who is so free in this early part of the debate to charge duplicity on me and others, to a strict account. I tell you, gentlemen, there is no consistency in your bill unless you consent to a reduction of your own salaries to $2,700.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the chairman of the committee should have made this assault thus early in the debate. His own consistency can be called to account more than that of any other member of this House. Up to one year ago—the 3d of March, 1875—he was the advocate of high salaries, and this marvelous conversion of his has occurred since that day; perhaps since he has become the chairman of this committee, and since we have had a democratic House. I do not know for what reason. I charge him with no duplicity. I give him credit for an honest conversion. But I do not apherby. I give him credit for an honest conversion. But I do not want him or any other gentleman to try to deter me from the discharge of my honest duty here by the charge of duplicity.

I now withdraw the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, when I came here fresh from the people into the Hall of this House, and having been selected by them not as a politician, but from the fact that I had never been mixed up in politics, I came here with the pledge that I made to them and that I intend in all honesty and good faith, so far as I am able to do it, to redeem, to use my voice and my votes in the direction of economy, retrenchment, and reform; and when I say here that I am honestly in favor of it, I defy any man anywhere to say that in attempting to strike down the salaries provided in this bill for Senators and Members and Delegates of the House I am actuated by anything but a patriotic desire to lift from the shoulders of the toiling millions of this country, as far as I am able, the burden that is now bearing them down and crushing and paralyzing the productive industries of the country. In evidence of my good faith in this direction at a very early day during the present session of Congress I introduced a bill, not knowing what would be done in the way of striking at the present session of congress I introduced a bill, not knowing what would be done in the way of striking at the present session. troduced a bill, not knowing what would be done in the way of striking at poor clerks and tide-waiters, about the public Departments of the Government. I introduced a bill fixing the compensation of Senators and Members and Delegates of the House at $3,600 a year, cutting off all mileage and other perquisites, because I believed the time had come when the interests of the country demand it, that men on the floor of this House should rise above mere grovelling petty pecuniary and party considerations and put their shoulders, as far as they are able, under the burdens the people are laboring under, and help to bring about purity and reform. I say here now that if the members, not simply from the "rural districts" that we have heard so much about, but the members who come here from their palatial residences in cities cannot serve the Government for $3,000. palatial residences in cities cannot serve the Government for $3,000 a year, the question should be relegated to their constituents and the opportunity afforded of sending men here actuated by patriotic influences who would be willing to serve for $3,000 a year.

I say that for one, I am willing to serve here as long as I have any desire to do so, and my constituents desire that I should serve, for $3,000 a year.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that judgment should commence in the house of the Lord, and that economy should be practiced right here. It is too easy, Mr. Chairman, for us to offer up vicarious sacrifices. It was Artemus Ward, I believe, who was willing to sacrifice upon the altar of his bleeding country every one of his wife's relations. I want to see ourselves subjected to this test, to see whether or not there is patriotism enough here to bring our own salaries down to the sum of $3,000 a year.

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I also am in favor of retrenchment and reform; but it is not for gentlemen on the other side of the House to preach reform to us on this side of the House. I have never said anything in regard to that Belknap affair, but it has always occurred to me since that matter came before the House that it was very appropriate that the Chief Clerk of this House, Hon. Green Adams, against whom the suspicion of having pocketed some of the people's money exists, should carry the articles of impeachment over to the other wing of this Capitol against a man charged with stealing nothing from the United States Government, but from private individuals.

Now, sir, in regard to this bill it was stated the other day by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he did not allow any "miserable man" to talk to him about his conscience. Whether he means to say that I was a miserable man, or that because he proposes to make this reduction I shall be a "miserable man," I do not know; but I will tell him that I am in favor of all reduction necessary for a proper and economical administration of the Government; I am in favor not only of striking $500 off our salaries, but of striking off as much in proportion as we strike off from the clerks in the Depart-

I would like to refresh the gentleman's memory. When he a few years ago, speaking of this very salary-grab, said that he could not live here "with any sort of decency for less than $7,500," does he propose to live in a sort of indecency now ! [Laughter.]

A Member. That costs more.

THITE. It reminds me very much of a Jew merchant that I ard of. He was trying to sell some of his goods to a country He told him he would sell him the article he was offering for Mr. WHITE. once heard of. $20, and that that was 10 per cent. below cost. The farmer told him he did not wish to buy unless the merchant would take a fair remuneration, a fair profit. "O!" said he, "I vill tell you how dat is: These goots belong to a rich uncle of mine, and I'sh trying to prake him up!" When the republican party was in power you did not care how much we spent, for you were trying to break us up. Now you have the majority, and you are attempting to economize and reform. [Laughter, continuing for some time.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must say to the galleries and to the members of the House that this applause must cease.

Mr. ATKINS. It was not applause, but laughter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. White] has one minute and a quarter of his time remaining.

Mr. WHITE. I am of the opinion that not only Senators and Congressmen, but heads of Departments and their assistants and clerks, are overpaid; that nearly all the officials here in the city of Washington in the employ of the Government are overpaid. I mean by that, turn them out upon their resources and these same men cannot in any of the walks of private life obtain the salaries they are getting here; and as long as that is the fact there is room for reduction of I will join hands with the men on that side or on this side of the House to put these salaries down to prices in accordance with those paid for similar services in the private walks of life. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I renew the amendment to the anendment.

And I hope I shall have credit for speaking sincerely. I do not believe it is possible for any man living to determine to-day by what method this Government is to adjust its expenditures to its income for the next five years. I therefore stand here earnestly and conscientiously to approve of every possible measure of economy, because I believe the exigencies of the case require it. But I warn gentlemen that the people will judge our acts with discrimination.

This bill reduces the salaries of men and families in a great many cases below a point at which they can sustain themselves respectably. It does not reduce the salaries of members of this House and of the other House to the point of respectable living. I have been accustomed in better times to spend something more; but I can live here for the days that members of Congress on the average are required to serve for $3,000 a year, and live respectably. I have been in Washington long enough to learn that. At any rate, I can live better than the clerk can live whose salary in 1856 was $1,400 for the whole year, and which it is now proposed by this bill to reduce 10

I suggest to the gentlemen of this committee that if they begin by indorsing these propositions in respect to their own pay, the country will sit in judgment on your inconsistency. You do not propose to treat your employés as you do yourselves, and the people of the country cannot be misled or deceived in regard to that matter. The case is plain on the face of it. You can see that the salary of the fourteenhundred-dollar clerk was fixed when your salary was fixed at $3,000 a year. And now look him in the face. That is what the country will You take 10 per cent. from his salary while you leave yours at $4,500, 50 per cent. more than it was when his was fixed at $1,400. Now, I do not see how you can go before the country and be sustained in that any more than the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was sustained by his constituents when he claimed that $7,500 a year was a fair compensation for a member of Congress. If we come here to make money, that amount is not more than a fair compensation; but if we come here to serve our country, then let us accept such sacrifices for ourselves as we require of Government employés. I desire to support this bill from beginning to end if I can consistently. I therefore support the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. rithdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The committee arose informally to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate insists upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply the deagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 2009) to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for certain Indians, and requests a conference with the House upon the disagreeing votes thereon, and have appointed Mr. WITHERS, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. OGLESBY, the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House, in a bill of the following

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by U. S. Grant, jr., one of his secretaries, announced that a bill of the following title, having been presented to the President on the 11th instant and not having been returned by him to the House within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his signature:

An act (H. R. No. 29) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I trust this House does not propose to repeat the pitiful spectacle which has been exhibited by former Congresses of the statesmen of this Republic spending a large portion of legislative time in wrangling about their own salaries. If there is anything in the political history of this country that I would give a hand to blot out, it is the debates and action on this subject of the pay of members of Congress which the last Congress and the Congress before the last exhibited to mankind.

I for one propose to yote against any chapper whatever in the salary Mr. HOAR. I renew the amendment to the amendment.

I for one propose to vote against any change whatever in the salary of members of Congress; first, because I think it is a thing that ought not to be perpetually stirred for political purposes; and because, on the whole, I think the present salary is as near right as we can get it. From necessity the people have trusted us—the only class of pubit. From necessity the people have trusted us—the only class of public servants who have been trusted in that way—with the right to fix our own compensation; and when it has once been fixed and acquiesced in by the public, it is in my judgment best that we should let it alone and not be constantly exposing ourselves as men to the imputation of low personal motives in dealing with this subject.

I do not think the amount paid to the clerks or other civil officers of the Government has any sort of relation to this question. When of the Government has any sort of relation to this question. When we employ a clerk or other civil officer, he is employed for pay; and the proper rule or principle for determining what he shall receive is to inquire what, considering the state of the market, is the proper compensation or pay for such services in the business concerns of the country. So of the laborer. But the member of Congress is to receive, not pay; he is to receive an honorable maintenance, decent and moderate, while he is engaged in an honorable trust. There are and moderate, while he is engaged in an honorable trust. There are very few lawyers in this House, very few business men; very few men of any class who will stand up and say that their pay for rendering their best services to anybody, year by year, is properly covered by the sum of $5,000. A large portion of them can earn twice or thrice the sum. Our fathers, when they fixed the salary of the President at $25,000 a year, fixed their own at a small per diem of, I think, $6. Do you suppose that Alexander Hamilton and James Madison were fixing their "pay" at $6 a day? They were looking to see what was simply an honorable and just maintenance—

[Here the bounder fell]

Here the hammer fell.] Mr. HOAR. I wish I could be obliged with about two or three

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to oppose the amendment; and I yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]
Mr. HOAR. They were looking to see what was an honorable and just maintenance for the most distinguished and able men who could be found in the several districts of this country, agreeing in political opinion with the majority of the people in those districts, who could be induced to serve the country in the exalted function of legislation. Now, I implore this House not to lay down for themselves or for their successors that exalted position and their personal relations to it.

I do not ask to be paid at the rate which we should be obliged to a distinguished architect, to a distinguished civil engineer, to a distinguished lawyer, who might be called into the service of the country professionally on some great occasion; and, on the other side, I do not consent to have the compensation of a clerk, respectable and honorable as his compensation may be, brought into this debate as a measure of my own.

The people were dissatisfied when in a time of great public pressure Congress raised the compensation of its members and with the circumstances which attended that transaction. I entirely respect and honor the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in saying, as he did recently, that he yielded his individual judgment in a matter where he was personally concerned to the general sense of the people and was desirous of retracing the step that had been taken. I sympathized very much with him too when, in reply to an inquiry of some one what he did with the money, he said somewhat indignantly that it was none of the questioner's business—a very good and proper answer, in my judgment.

I hope we shall not in considering this subject look to see whether

I hope we shall not in considering this subject look to see whether somebody can go upon some stump where the question is not understood and say "I voted to cut down my compensation $500, and Mr. Brown, running against me, voted to pat his compensation up." I hope we shall look simply at this one question, is it expedient to be constantly debating and stirring this subject? Is it not best for the country and the dignity of this House to let it sleep as the people have let it sleep ever since the bill increasing congressional salaries was repealed?

On the other hand, is not the sum of $5,000, under all the circumstances, a moderate, reasonable, and proper compensation? Is it more than that? Nobody outside finds any fault with it. You have a thousand calls upon you. You have to maintain a family in one place when the head of the family is in another place. To render this public service in the prime and vigor of your faculties you have to break up for years the business to which your life has been devoted. Taking all these things into consideration the people are satisfied that the salary of $5,000 a year shall continue, if you will only let the question alone and not repeat the disgraceful exhibition of legislators and statesmen of the American people taking up hours and days and weeks of the public time in wrangling over this pitiful question of their own pay

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty we found ourselves in was this: that, if we reduced other salaries and did not reduce our own, we would be directly chargeable with inconsistency; and, while I have great respect for the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] yet his argument really would go to show that we ought not to reduce any salaries 10 per cent. It seemed to us there was but one safe, firm ground on which we could stand.

Mr. Hoar. Will the gentleman allow me to state my point again?

When you hire a clerk, you look to see for how much you can hire in the market an honorable and faithful clerk, and you grade his pay in that way. When you fix the pay of Congressmen you inquire what is the measure of a decent and honorable maintenance for the families and for the statesmen who are called to pass laws for the American The two have no sort of connection.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, we could not rest without touch ing our own salaries. Such, at least, was the judgment of the com-

A word or two now as to the clerks, about whom so much has been We do not touch the salary of any clerk at $1,200 and under. We did reduce those above that figure the percentage which has been indicated. In so doing we took into consideration the large reduction of price in all the necessaries of life. It cannot be denied there has been very material reduction in the price of cotton goods, potatoes, bread, and the like.

This House a day or two ago, as an offset to the reduction provided for in this bill, passed an act prohibiting hereafter enforced contributions from clerks in the various Departments for political purposes. butions from clerks in the various Departments for political purposes. The practical result of that will be a saving to that extent to all these employés of the Government, while at the same time, in my judgment, it will be the breaking up of a vicious system of getting from the Treasury of the United States, not directly it is true, but nevertheless getting from the Treasury of the United States money by enforced contributions from employés to carry on elections. It comes right down to this: That while we give these clerks the salary provided for in this bill at the same time it has been provided they shall vided for in this bill at the same time it has been provided they shall not be compelled to contribute a certain percentage of their salary for political purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment, but at the same time wish to say something as to the propriety of reducing our own salaries. It is not a question whether $5,000 or $4,500 the country to explain this or that particularly to him. We must go to them and show that we have laid down a rule, and have cut down our own salaries in the same proportion that we have cut down the salaries of others. That certainly will be demanded of us

I am not speaking now for the sake of pleasing them, but the question will be asked, if members of Congress could change their own salaries, why did they cut down the salaries of all other employés of the Government from 10 to 20 per cent. and yet at the same time did not touch their own? We have said that the interest of the country demanded retrenchment, and we say so now, and the people will ask, such being the case, why did you not cut down your own salaries? No, sir, we cannot go before the people and satisfy them unless we show a disposition by our act here to reduce our own salaries 10 per cent. for the common good of the country. I hope, however, it will not be attempted to make the salaries so little that we cannot win not be attempted to make the salaries so little that we cannot support ourselves. Nevertheless, let us give something of our own pay to go into the coffers of the nation, and that far help to release the people from the debt under which by heavy taxation they now labor.

Mr. CASWELL. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I rise more particularly to say a word in reference to the charge of insincerity made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] against the gentleman from Ohio in offering his amendment. That charge, no doubt, would be quite as applicable to a large portion of this side of the House, for we are all supporting it. a large portion of this side of the House, for we are all supporting it. In my judgment, this bill as it stands is a compilation of inconsistencies and of insincerities. We have just as good right to express that opinion as he has, that any of us are insincere in supporting the pending amendment. Now as to the proof. We are pretty well informed here that a short time ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania advocated on this floor, and I cannot think he would advocate a measure he did not then believe in, that a salary of $7,500 was a sum not too large for a member of Congress. And, sir, I am inclined to believe, I am forced to the belief that when he placed in this hill the sum of am forced to the belief, that when he placed in this bill the sum of $4,500 as a compensation for a member it must have been against his judgment; but he justifies himself on the ground that the people called him to an account and drove him from his position. Let me say, sir, that the people will see through this scheme, and will demand of the Committee on Appropriations, if we place our hands upon the salaries of the employés and clerks in the various Departments, and the heads of the Bureaus, that we also be consistent and sincere and place our salaries where they were in 1854, at the time these salaries were fixed, and then deduct therefrom the regular percentage. I say the people will see through this scheme, and will demand reduction of our own salaries as then fixed if we reduce the salaries of the employés in the various branches of the Government. It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that the ability and the assistants which we desire to draw from the people and place at the head of Bureaus and in other positions under the Government cannot be obtained if we reduce these salaries. The compensation is already too small in many instances for that grade of talent we desire to secure. If we cut them down we must expect the character of service will

If we cut them down we must expect the character of service will retrograde and be inefficiently performed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will be frank enough to say that in a great many features of this bill when they were under consideration in the committee, I did not concur at the time. They were adopted by the committee, and after the bill was completed, as I understand it, we agreed upon it, or a majority of the committee agreed upon it as the best upon 16, or a majority of the committee agreed upon it as the best thing that could be done. It was announced, and gentlemen seem to be continually recurring to that, by the chairman of the committee that the purpose of the committee was to reduce 10 per cent. in salaries and 20 per cent. in number. That was true as understood by the chairman at that time. We so understood it when we entered upon this bill. But when we began to take up the details, we began to find day after day that it was impossible to follow that rule; and therefore we went into each Department, considered it carefully, and arrived at the conclusions contained in this bill.

In the Post-Office Department our reductions have been very much less than they have been in any other direction. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] complains of what was done in the Sixth Auditor's Office. I may state to him that the Sixth Auditor himself is entirely content with what has been done in that Bureau. That we should commit errors is not unnatural; but I venture to say that any man will concede that a committee taking up all the details in this man will concede that a committee taking up all the details in this bill, examining it carefully, having all the several Departments before them, receiving their views and considering them, are much more likely to arrive at correct conclusions than this House.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I did not complain of the arrangements for the Sixth Auditor's Office? I only referred to that as one of the Offices whose business had been increased.

I had not examined what the committee had done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will say that although the business has increased there to a greater extent perhaps than in any other Bureau, we have made reductions there and they are entirely satisfactory to the Sixth

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Georgia does not want to mislead the House

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course not.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I wish the House to understand that amend ments have been made by the committee since this bill was reported, which are satisfactory to the Sixth Auditor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not so remember it. But let that be as it may, it fully illustrates the fact that this committee, instead of doing what is charged upon them, of making an assault upon all the Departments of the Government for political effect, when proper and reasonable amendments have been proposed by the Departments have assented to them. And it comes with an ill grace from the gentleman of the committee who corrects me on that point to speak of the inconsistency of the democratic House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the question before the House, the reduction of our salaries. I will not undertake to argue whether or not that reduction is right or wrong. But I do say, sir, that it is apparent to the country that there is a reduction of at least $5,000,000, and if this House shall ever accomplish that reduction gentlemen will in vain stand there and turn to the chairman of the committee and quote his speeches. They will in vain stand there and talk about your rules. What the country cares about is what we accomplish, and the country will understand such proceedings on the part of those gentlemen as a piece of deception. I expected this attack upon this very clause, by some perhaps from honest, and by some from insincere motives.

I heard, sir, at the outset, almost as soon as this was agreed upon, floating through the Capitol that as soon as the bill reached the Senate the salary of a member of Congress would be reduced to $7 or ate the salary of a member of Congress would be reduced to $7 or $8 a day. I have heard all through the House predictions of the failure of this bill. Sir, if there be any failure I undertake to say the responsibility of it will not be over here, and that this side of the House will have no explanations to make to the country. I admit that there may be errors in the bill. It is natural there should be. But there is a great good to be accomplished by the bill and the country will see it. country will see it.

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out the last word of the pending

I did not understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Blount] to say that in addition to the fact that the arrangements in regard to the Sixth Auditor's Office have been made satisfactory upon consultation with that officer, the proposition for the Post-Office Department was satisfactory to the officers of that Department. I wish he ment was satisfactory to the officers of that Department. I wish he would state whether that is satisfactory to that Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly. I asked the question for information.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire, then, to say to the gentleman—

Mr. KASSON. At the same time I beg the gentleman not to take up my time beyond answering the question I have addressed to him.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to answer it in my own way.

Mr. KASSON. Then he must excuse me. I put the question with a hone file desire for information.

fide desire for information. Mr. BLOUNT. You will get it bona fide if you let me give it to you

Mr. BLOUNI. Too will get it bona jude it you let me give it to you in my own way.

Mr. RANDALL. I will give the gentleman a direct answer if he will permit me. The Post-Office Department has assented to the amendments of the committee with very slight modifications, the amount of money involved in the difference being less than $10,000.

Mr. KASSON. I observe from the printed statement which the committee has submitted that the estimate calls for three hundred and seventy-five in number and the bill allows two hundred and ninety-eight. And I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say, in view of what I had stated about that Department and its increasing business, that there was but a slight reduction made there— Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all.

Mr. KASSON. And in pursuance of the plan which I presented to myself of getting at the honest needs of the Government and nothing else, I made the inquiry I did, and I regret that the gentleman from Georgia did not meet me in that spirit.

I consider this a clear reduction of the horizontal rate suggested by the committee. If I have misunderstood it I am anxious to be corrected, but that is what I find in the printed statement which I understand comes from the Committee on Appropriations. I do not now understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say that the Postmaster-General says he can discharge the duties of his Department with this large decrease of clerks. If he does say so I accept the statement with perfect sincerity, but I do not so under-

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand, the Postmaster-General is satisfied with this bill if we will increase the number of clerks four and the number of laborers five.

Mr. KASSON. 'If the gentleman's information comes from the Postmaster-General, and if he says that, I am satisfied. My information, however, is different. But I accept whatever the gentleman states of his own knowledge.

Mr. RANDALL. That was my understanding with the Postmaster-General, but if the gentleman has had any subsequent conversation with the Postmaster-General I cannot contradict any statement he makes about it; but I desire to say that we fixed upon this number of employés after the fullest conference with the Postmaster-General, who was repeatedly before the committee.

Mr. KASSON. But not, I understand, with his concurrence.

While I am up, allow me to say that I trust that this 'discussion may go on in the spirit indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his colloquy with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I assure the gentlemen opposite that this side of the House does not want one clerk retained whose removal does not interfere with the prompt transaction of the public business. But I do also know that in some of the Departments to day, with all the force they have now, there is much delay in getting business through without taking it up out of its regular order. This is the case in the Pension Office, in the Post-Office Department, and in some other offices.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HILL. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I desire at the proper time—and I say it now because it may affect the vote on the pending motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Foster]—to move to strike out the words "30th day of June" and insert the words "3d day of March."

The reason for this is that I have always thought that there was great force in the remark made by Mr. Madison when this same question was before the convention that framed the Constitution, and that was that he regarded it as a very indecent thing for members of Con-gress to be voting their own compensation. That was when the question of framing the Constitution was before the convention and there tion of framing the Constitution was before the convention and there were several propositions in relation to the pay of Senators and members of Congress before it. I have always believed that the proposition then before the convention that Senators and members of the House should be compensated by the several States was the proper method, for several reasons. It has since been judicially determined that Senators and members of Congress are not officers of the Federal Covernment, but officers of the States. I wish to remove a few as forces Government, but officers of the States. I wish to remove as far as possible what Mr. Madison regarded as an indecent thing, and that is, members voting their own compensation; and I think now is a good time to set a precedent.

I concede that on several occasions members of Congress have voted their own compensation, but I have always thought it was a bad precedent. It was necessary, of course, in the First Congress, because there had been none preceding it, to fix the compensation; it has never been necessary since, and I think what was called popularly "the salary grab" in the last Congress would have lost much of its power if it had not applied to the Congress then in session; and it is according ing to the analogy of our laws that we should let our legislation have a prospective operation. Members are elected to a certain Congress with their pay fixed by law. I think it should not be increased or diminished so as to affect that Congress. I think this Congress ought to set that example, and whether they fix the compensation at $2,700, or $3,000, or $5,000, or at $8 a day, let it take effect with the next Congress. Let this Congress remove from itself the scandal, as Mr. Madison justly called it, of voting its own pay. On that question I concur in the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] This arrangement may not be a perfect one, because one-In the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.] This arrangement may not be a perfect one, because one-third of the Senate retire on the 4th of March, but at least no member of this House, if this rule is adopted, will ever be voting on his own salary; and if the people choose to send him back here after the compensation is fixed for the next Congress, let them do so.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman think it unsafe to allow Congress to reduce its pay? I know it is unsafe to allow them to increase it.

Mr. HILL. I wish to establish a rule now, so that the future Congresses may not reduce or increase their pay. Of course it is more proper to reduce it than to increase it.

Mr. KASSON. In some of the States the constitution admits of a decrease but forbids an increase

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I wish to remind him of this fact: that we have already appropriated money at the last session of the last Congress for the fiscal year which ends June This bill provides for the compensation of members of Congress and all other persons commencing from the 1st of July next, and therefore we must of necessity conform to that date.

Mr. HILL. Does this same bill reduce the pay of the President during his term t

Mr. RANDALL. No; the Constitution does not permit that.
Mr. HILL. After the 4th of March next?
Mr. RANDALL. We do not reduce the salary of the President of

Mr. RANDALL. We do not reduce the salary of the President of the United States who now occupies the place, because the Constitution of the United States would not permit that.

Mr. HILL. Why not do the same thing here, and not reduce the compensation of the present members of Congress until that time?

Mr. RANDALL. Because the money for the payment of the salary of the President of the United States from the 30th of June to the 4th of March next is already by law provided for.

Mr. HILL. Cannot you by changing the provisions of this bill make the same arrangement with regard to members of Congress?

Mr. FOSTER. I want to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL.] If he will allow a vote to be taken on my amendment in the House by yeas and nays,

I will not press it now.

Mr. RANDALL. At this early stage of the consideration of this bill I cannot agree to make any arrangement out of the order of the usual rule.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no rule on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, the usual practice, if you please.
Mr. DOUGLAS. If the pending amendment is divisible, I ask to have a vote taken separately upon striking out the sum named, so as Mr. FOSTER. The chairman has a right to yield to me in the House to offer my amendment,

Mr. RANDALL. I am not so instructed by the committee. I will

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move to strike out the last ten words of this paragraph. I have no hesitation in declaring myself opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Foster, J and I have no hesitation in declaring myself opposed to the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations. I came to this House under a substantial contract between me and the people of the United States that, if I would leave my business, in which I labored diligently for a long life, and come to Washington and act in the position of a Representative in this House, I should be paid $5,000 a year. And I am unwilling to allow any set of persons, I do not care if they be my exercite there to practice a providential of the contract was not provided to the contract when we have the provident of the contract was not provident to the contract when we have the provident of the contract was not provident. associates here, to practice a repudiation of that contract upon me. [Laughter.] I am talking personally about the matter. My constituents believed that my services in this House of Representatives would be worth the sum provided by law to be paid to me, and it was for that reason that they elected me. I am boasting not one word over any other gentleman in this House when I say that, for I believe it was the opinion of the people of every other district in the United States that the men they elected as Representatives were worth, or are probably worth, to the people of this country the sum that was proposed to be paid to them.

Now, we have one of two things to do in this matter; we must say that nobody but rich men shall represent the people of the United States in Congress or men who are willing to steal, or we must furnish a reasonable provision for the support of men who leave their farms, their merchandise, their professional business, to come here for the time being to look after the interests of the country. Now I do not believe that the people of this country desire to give over their not believe that the people of this country desire to give over their destinies to the professional politicians or to the rich men of the country. I have no quarrel with the rich men; I wish I were rich too. But it is not the wish of the people of this country that none but rich men shall come here. If my people do not want to pay me a reasonable provision for the support of myself and my family, they certainly will not send me here.

I have nothing to say about the remainder of this bill. I rose to a question of personal privilege, [laughter;] I rose to speak in regard to what every gentleman of this House knows to be strictly true, that the salary now maid him is not too much; that that amount of salary the salary now paid him is not too much; that that amount of salary is necessary to every man who does not live out of his private fortune or some plunder of the Treasury, or post-tradership, or some railroad company; and there is not enough of those to go round. [Great laughter.] If we are to live at all respectably, to settle with our boarding-house-keepers and our washer-women, we will never reduce our salaries. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment by Mr. Foster to fix the salary of Senators at $2,700 a year, and it was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to amend by striking out the fourteenth line in relation to mileage of Senators and to insert what I now send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HILL. I have indicated an amendment to the paragraph now under consideration. I move to amend by striking out the words "30th of June" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "3d of March." It will then read, "From and after the 3d of March next the compensation," &c. I desire to say in support of my amendment that I do not think the criticism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] touches the question at all. If you can say, as this bill now does, that this reduction of our salaries shall take effect from and after the 30th of June, you can fix any date you please. If the total appropriation named in this paragraph is too much or too little, by reason of my amendment, you can change it.

Mr. ATKINS. The language which the gentleman proposes to strike out belongs to the whole bill, not simply to that paragraph.

Mr. HILL. I do not so understand it.

Mr. ATKINS. Read it. Mr. HILL. The provision is:

From and after the 30th of June next the compensation of said Senators shall be  $$4,500~{\rm per}$  annum.

Mr. ATKINS. That is the only place in the bill where the date is fixed.

fixed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] is right.

Mr. HILL. I know I am right.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe I was mistaken.

Mr. HILL. I think we ought to set this precedent.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to have the Chair state what is the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending proposition is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.,] which will be read by the Clerk. by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 11 and 12 of the printed bill strike out the words "30th of June" and insert, in lieu thereof, "3d of March;" so that it will read: "From and after the 3d of March next the compensation of said Senators shall be $4,500 per annum.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I think it very important for this House to establish the precedent which I insist is involved in this amendment. It is more important than the question of reduction or increase of any salary. Let this House for the first time set the precedent and thereby if possible establish it is a principle, that members shall not on any occasion vote on their own salaries. Let them vote if they choose upon the salaries of future Congresses, but not upon their own. It is an "indecent thing," and I think the practice ought-always to have been what I am now advocating. I regret that it has not been the practice heretofore. If it had been the practice we should have been saved a great deal of unnecessary scandal a few years ago. I therefore insist upon the amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, one of the principal objections to the amendment urged by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL]—and I think it is entitled to great weight in determining the votes of memis that it will be time enough at the next session of Congress to decide what shall be the pay of the Forty-fifth Congress, whether it be increased or diminished. It is not worth while now, in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, for us to interfere, in the way of decrease or increase, with the pay of the next Congress. It may very well be, as my friends around here tell me, that at the next session members will have been elected to the Forty-fifth Congress, but the new term will not commence before the 3d of March, 1877, and before that time there will have been an intervening session of Congress.

But, Mr. Chairman, that does not concern particularly the primary motive which induced me to rise here. I do not care specially whether this amendment fails or prevails. My principal motive is, before I conclude, to submit another amendment (if it be in order) which has already been spoken to but which has not yet been offered; it is that the compensation of members of this Congress, and so far as we can arrange it of all future Congresses, shall be the sum now fixed by law—$5,000. I do not consider that either consistency, propriety, duty, or public sentiment demands that we shall make any change whatever in regard to our present compensation. I trust the Congressional Record will never again be discredited or disgraced by any such unseemly debate as that which characterized the Forty-second Congress, and which was renewed, as an inglorious legacy, in the Forty-third Congress. In this respect I concur in the expression which fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

I think, sir, that the salary of $5,000 a year, which was substituted for the salary of $7,500 fixed in the Forty-second Congress, was determined in obedience to public sentiment. A salary of $5,000 is in accordance with the will of the people; and I challenge my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I challenge my friend from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] I challenge any member of the Committee on Appropriations to refer me to the action of any convention, any Legislature, any public body or popular assembly, asking that that salary be repealed or interfered with. If we are here to legislate in obedience to the will of the people, I ask where will you find the record or expression of any public sentiment which justifies us in interfering with a salary which was fixed for this Congress by a Congress which preceded it. If the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hill] is right, then as the Forty-third Congress has fixed our salary, it is unseemly and indecent for this Congress to interfere with that salary either by increase or decrease.

Mr. Chairman, if I had the time I think I could demonstrate to this House that there is no public sentiment anywhere throughout the country, expressed within the last nine months, which demands of us the wholesale reduction and retrenchment embraced in this bill. I approve of these reductions in part; there may be here and there a salary that ought to be diminished or an office that should be altogether abolished. But I say there is nothing emanating from the public press or included in those party shibboleths "retrenchment, economy, and reform" which will justify the attempt made, I fear, in this bill to cripple the Government itself. I do not pretend to say that the democratic majority in this House or the democratic members on the Committee on Appropriations mean anything of that character. I do not profess to believe that they would for a moment be willing to make it even possible that such a thing should occur. But if I am to believe the language conveyed to me in writing by officers of this Government as high as the Secretary of the Treasury himself, speaking with reference to the details of his own office, its needs and requirements, then I am here to say that it is alleged this bill will interfere with the ordinary routine of the Government, and will to a certain extent embarrass the general business of the Department.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] would be in order.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend by striking out—

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will not the gentleman yield for a moment until I have stated the proposition I intended to move by way of amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I presume I am going to make about the same motion that the gentleman would make.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I wish to move an amendment restoring the pay

Mr. KELLEY. I was about to move to strike out in the twelfth and thirteenth lines the words "$4,500" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. HOAR, I propose when these various amendments of detail have been voted upon, to move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. KELLEY, I am glad to know that my friend from Maryland anticipated me in what I think so proper an amendment as that the salary should remain at the sum now fixed by law. I have not participated in the general debate on this bill. There is much in it that I approve and much more that I disapprove. I am in favor of reducing the clerical and all other force in the several Departments of the Government as much as can be done consistently with the maintenance of their efficiency. And wherever it can be shown there is a clerk or other employé who is supernumerary, whose place is a sine-cure, or whose duties might be performed by another without being burdensome, I say I shall gladly vote for such a reduction.

I do not believe, sir, the sentiment of the country demands the reduction of officials suggested by this bill. I do believe it proposes a reduction of force which would be disastrous to the service. I need go no further than to the Clerk's office for an illustration of that fact. Politically the question belongs to the other side. The Clerk is a democrat, chosen by the majority of this House; his appointees are all of the same party, and I do not complain of it. Had my party elected the Clerk all of them would have been republicans.

the Clerk all of them would have been republicans.

A MEMBER. Not so.

Mr. KELLEY. I think so; at least they would have professed to be republicans while holding an office. [Laughter.] Therefore I had no quarrel with the political character of the incumbents. It is not my question politically, but I do not believe that the number of employes left would effectively perform the duties of the office. I do believe the pay assigned to them is utterly inadequate and will only be accepted for the present in view of the present terrible depression private business is now suffering and the difficulty of finding employment. Were business in its normal condition, men fit to fill those Were business in its normal condition, men fit to fill those places could not be found at these salaries, perhaps, unless it was with the assurance there were perquisites.

Now, I want to pay the employés of the Government fair and honest salaries and hold them to strict accountability. No man can bring his family here, to turn to the case of Senators and Representatives, no man can bring his family here and maintain them as they should be maintained on $5,000 a year. No man who is deserving of the name of lawyer—there may be some members of the bar who are not much of lawyers who could not probably earn $5,000 a year—no lawyer in full practice, who does not lay down $5,000 a year for the honor of holding this office, the office of Senator or member. I do not believe the American people desire such pay to be put where poor men can-not fill the place, let their fitness be what it may, or that men shall come here to live in garrets, or to absent themselves from their fam-come here to live in garrets, or to absent themselves from their lamilies to poach on the domains of others.

The American people love money. They love the excitement of gaining, but they spend and part with it by gift more lavishly than any other people. Look at our private benevolences, our schools, our churches, &c. They attest the little regard our people attach to the mere possession of money. There is something they pride themselves much more in than the retention of dollars and cents. It is the honor of their country. It is that they may stand well in the eyes of each other and of the world; and I should regard this bill as a reproach upon the people in that behalf—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, properly speaking, his amendment is not an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, as one has reference to time and the other to the sum.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well; I will get five minutes more on it when I submit it in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not.

Mr. SINGLETON. As a matter of course it could not be ex-

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to say that I have accepted the amendment as proposed by my friend from Maryland, and am willing it should be pending in that way, and we will discuss it when the time comes. Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of course it could not be expected that any gentleman upon this floor in a five minutes' speech could say much that would throw light upon so grave a question of the course tion as we have under consideration. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I deem it my duty to say when we came to the consideration of this bill there was no question of politics intro-duced. The question whether a man belonged to one party or another when we came to deal with his salary was never mentioned. Therefore to give this measure a political aspect is doing us injustice.

The purpose of the committee was in the first place to inquire whether the necessities of the country demanded there should be retrenchment of expenses in the various Departments. That was the first inquiry. I need not argue that proposition, for every member on this floor knows there is a pressing demand, one we cannot avoid, for the curtailment of expenditures in every quarter where it can be done. The next question was, can we make this reduction without injury to the public service? We believed that that could be done. We differed somewhat as to the details, as to the manner in which it should be done, as to where we should apply the knife and where we should not. But it was agreed upon all hands that we could make this reduction without impairing the public service. The question arose how was this to be done, and after some discussion we adopted what was called the 10 per cent. rule; not as the gentleman from Ohio asserts to be departed from in no instance, to be adhered to in every case, but as a general rule, from which we might depart when-ever we found it necessary. Well, sir, in the course of our investiga-tions we found some of the salaries of these officers raised to such an extent that, in order to bring them down to accord with others who were rendering like services, it was necessary we should reduce them more than 10 per cent. Hence it is you find that the 10 per cent. rule is not adhered to in every case. It was not adopted as an invariable rule, it was not intended to be such, and we have not in all cases followed it for the reasons I have explained.

Gentlemen dwell with peculiar emphasis upon the salaries of memderitiemen dwen with pecuniar emphasis upon the sharres of members of Congress. As long as the amendments offered looked to a reduction of these salaries below the pay proposed by the bill of the committee, I did not think it proper to say one word, but now, when it is proposed to raise the amounts above what was provided for in it is proposed to raise the amounts above what was provided for in the bill, I feel it my duty to stand by the report of the committee. I contend that $4,500 is ample pay and ought to be satisfactory to every member of the House, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland raising it to $5,000 ought not to be adopted. I cannot sympathize with the gentlemen on the other side of the House, who seem to think that because they cannot get $5,000 they must reduce the amount to $2,700. If, as they contend, their services are worth $5,000, and they cannot get that amount because of a difference of opinion among us, then let them take the next best thing attainable and be content with the $4,500. In doing so we subject ourbe if we applied that rule to others and yet dodged it ourselves. If we had reported a bill reducing the salaries of all the clerks and employes and not our own, what would have been said on the other side ployés and not our own, what would have been said on the other side of the House? I know very well what would then have been the line of argument. It would have been said you have reduced the salaries of others but have left your own intact. The republicans have made resistance to every bill which the committee have reported. We have not been able to please them in any of the appropriation bills upon which we have been called to act. They have met them with proposed amendments which they believed would so clog and embarrass the bills as to have the effect to ultimately destroy them. I hope this side of the House will take cognizance of these facts and not be led off by these amendments. facts and not be led off by these amendments.

I do not pretend to say that the Committee on Appropriations has all the wisdom of this House. We do not know anything of these matters more than others except so far as they have been brought specially to our attention. We have communicated with the Departments; have had the headsof Bureaus before us with books, maps, and estimates; have collected and collated all the facts in our reach, and have endeavored honestly to discharge our duty with a view to the public interests of the country and justice to individuals. We there-public interests of the country and justice to individuals. We therefore claim that this House should stand by the committee, that you should accept the report which it has made and adopt it with perhaps some slight amendments; but to undertake at the outset of this discussion to deal with this bill, as some gentlemen on the other side of the House propose to do, is to effectually destroy it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Hill,] to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] proposed an amendment not properly germane. The Chair will withhold putting the question on the last amendment until the first, that of the gentleman from Georgia, is disposed of until the first, that of the gentleman from Georgia, is disposed of.

Mr. JENKS. I rise really to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in order to do so I move an amendment to that amendment by striking out the last word in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that Mr. JENKS. Very well; I move to strike out the last word in the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The ground upon which I am in favor of this reduction of salaries and opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania Mr. Kelley] is somewhat different from any I have heard stated. It is not for any partisan purpose that we ought to reduce or to increase these salaries one cent. We ought to do it on some other ground than that. And it is not a strictly proper question whether the people have demanded it at our hands or whether they have not, because we ourselves are a part of the people, and it as much our duty to speak as it is theirs; and it is in order that we may speak to the people with propriety that I would insist on this reduction of salaries.

After the failure of the great banking house of Jay Cooke & Co., in the fall of 1873, business depression spread all over the land, and from that time till this moment we feel that depression growing heavier and heavier. By that we were first brought fully into view of this fact, that the people, individually and collectively, were living too extravagantly; that we were spending more than we ought to do. It has happened to us in appearing before the people to speak to them time and again on this subject, and we have said to them, "It is your duty to reduce your expenses; it is your duty to forego every extravagance, and to cease to indulge in many luxuries in which you have hitherto indulged." But in order that we may speak to them with force, it is necessary that we should here speak to them, and say that we ourselves propose to forego something in the way of luxuries. If we ourselves propose to forego something in the way of fuxuries. In we merely stand here and say we expect you to give up some of your luxuries, while we leave our salaries untouched, they would not believe that we were speaking in honest good faith. But if we say to them we ask you to forego luxuries, let us make some reduction ourselves, and indicate that we desire all to forego luxuries, collectively and individually, so that this depression which has been spread over the nation by extravagance shall cease to exist.

Sir, it is in this view that I trust there will be a reduction in our own salaries to establish the principle and to show our bona fide teaching to the people that they must cease to be extravagant if they ever expect to recover from financial distress. We can extricate ourselves from it only by recognizing the fact that we have been spending too much. Whenever a manufacturer ceases to be able to pay what he has heretofore paid, he either reduces the salaries of his employés or reduces the number of his employés. Now, when this Government is placed in the same position, it is our duty to recognize the common-place business principles of reducing our expenditures.

Sir, I do not regard this question from any political aspect, but we cannot speak to the American people with more good sense and more effectually than by saying, stop your luxuries and extravagance; and we cannot do that better than by first reducing our own salaries.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was on Mr. HILL's amendment.
Mr. RANDALL. I want to say a word.
The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the amendment.
Mr. RANDALL. That amendment would change the date of the entire bill.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division there res 84, noes 99.

Mr. KELLEY called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HILL and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 81.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 81.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. O'BRIEN and accepted by Mr. Kelley, in lines 12 and 13 to strike out the words "$4,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment is not subject to the point of order, I admit, for it does not change the existing law. In the interest of geometry, I wish to say a word expired this amendment.

economy I wish to say a word against this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the committee will not adopt this amend-If it is adopted, of course gentlemen understand that it is the abandonment of every retrenchment aimed at in this bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] must know that in proposing to restore the salary by the provision of this bill to what it is now, he renders a reduction of salaries absolutely impossible, and neither he nor any other gentleman on either side of the House can consistently with his own sense of honor favor a reduction of any other salary unless the salaries of members of the House shall be reduced. I believe, sir, that it would be my duty, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to stand by this bill in this respect if the House, with the bill framed as it is, should conclude to accept that provision; but I learn from the arguments of gentlemen that inasmuch as the salaries of Senators and members of the House are reduced 10 per cent. and the salaries of other employés of the Government are reduced from 10 to 20 per cent., they will therefore use the failure in reducing the salaries of members to a corresponding extent as an excuse for opposition to the bill.

I have this appeal to make to the House, (I do not desire to make it to one side or the other, but to the House:) if it is intended that there shall be retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government, that they will not leave ground on which any gentleman can stand, a bulwark behind which they can intrench themselves in opposing every reduction of salaries proposed by this bill, I say to the gen-tleman from Pennsylvania, and I do it in no spirit of appeal to any tleman from Pennsylvania, and I do it in no spirit of appeal to any prejudice here or elsewhere, that in my judgment the salary of a member of Congress as now fixed by law is disproportionately high as compared with the salaries of employés of the Government in general, and especially as compared to the compensation paid for public services in the various States of this Union. And further, in a Government like ours, where frugality and simplicity of manners are the custom and can alone be in harmony with the idea of free institutions, I insist that high salaries tend to destroy that simplicity which compares well with a government like ours.

tions, I insist that high salaries tend to destroy that simplicity which comports well with a government like ours.

These gentlemen say that we cannot live respectably in this capital for a less salary than $5,000 a year. I am certain that the salary is too high. I desire to say only in the presence of this House, and nowhere else, that this salary is too high. We lived through the war on a salary of $3,000, and animated as men were then by a spirit of extriction. I never because the salary is the flower complete the salary in the salary is the salary in the salary of $3,000. patriotism, I never heard a gentleman on this floor complain of the salary when the expenses of living were almost twice what they are now. I heard no complaints then of the salary being insufficient; and now. I heard no complaints then of the salary being insufficient; and if gentlemen could live in this capital with a family and live respectably, so that he would be glad to see any portion of his constituents when they came to this capital, at an expenditure of $200 or $250 a month, why a gentleman can certainly live very comfortably now with an ordinary family for from $100 to $150 per month, even during the session of Congress, without reference to that considerable period of his congressional term during which members are subject to their own control, to avoid expenditures and attend to their own affairs. I insist that the proposition that we should fix the salary at $3,600 a year. sist that the proposition that we should fix the salary at $3,600 a year would far better comport with the general salaries paid by the Government, and especially with the salaries paid by the States to their officers, than a salary of $5,000 a year; and I would be glad to see the House adopt that amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see that I have got but a moment With the salary of members of Congress reduced, what gentleman, even though pressed by his clerical friends in the Departments—and I know that our friends on the other side of the House are so embarrassed—would feel any embarrassment at all in voting for the reduction of salaries.

But as it is now, unless we reduce our own salaries to compare somewhat with the reductions made in other salaries, gentlemen may well intrench themselves behind that fact and resist all reduction of well intrenen themselves behind that fact and resist all reduction of salaries. No, no, Mr. Chairman, if this House, in view of the pressure upon us for economy, greater than at the period when our salaries were $3,000 a year, and the expense of living in this capital nearly twice what it is now—if this House will rise to the demands of the occasion, when public burdens are felt oppressively by all the industries of the country, when multitudes of the people are unemployed, when reduction of the expenditures of the Government is a thing important with the respectable sum. perative, if we reduce our own salaries now to the respectable sum of $3,600—ay, a respectable salary, I say, for any gentleman in public or private employment—that would give an assurance to the country that there will be a permanent reduction in the expenditures of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. V Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. Will the gentleman answer a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope I will be allowed to answer the question of my colleague, [Mr. Baker.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask unanimous consent of the committee that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] be extended for

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must enforce the rule. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to modify my amendment. Instead of striking out $4,500 and inserting $5,000, I will move to strike out all of the paragraph except the words "for compensation of Senators, $333,000." That will answer my purpose more effectually, and I will now yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman.]

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent to modify the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] which has been debated on

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment. If I could have obtained the recognition of the Chair, I would have moved, in anticipation of what has fallen from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] an amendment reducing the compensation of members of Congress to $3,600 a year, the sum indicated by

I do not intend to raise the question here or to discuss it when raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Townsend] and others as to rich men or poor men. I have heard that ad nauseam. I say to the gentleman from New York that, so far as this side of the House is con-cerned, especially the southern element of it, "Ye have the poor with you always.

I believe that I can live here very respectably on the sum I have named. I am certain that no member upon this floor on either side of the main aisle can need a higher compensation than that; and, if the present majority on this side of the House means anything at all, it means that it is an expression of the demand of the people of this country for retrenchment and reform.

I shall not go into the question as to how the extravagant expendi-I shall not go into the question as to now the extravagant expenditures that have prevailed here for years past, especially since the close of the war, have been kept up. But I know one thing, that in that section of the country which I in part represent, standing in the presence of a diminishing revenue and the paralyzed industries all over the country, with a constant decline in the expense of living, the people did demand, in a voice that must be heard here and elsewhere, that there should be retrenchment in the expenditures of this Gov-ernment. My equanimity will not be at all disturbed by any taunts about my sincerity. I will let that question be tested by my acts. I will respond to the demand of my constituents and of the people of this country for retrenchment in this Government, in every branch of it, the legislative as well as the others.

I was of the opinion that the principle enunciated in the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] was correct, and that it was an "indecent thing" for us to be sitting here deliberating upon the matter of our own compensation, whether to increase or to diminish it. But I bow to the decision of the majority of this House. They have determined to retain that feature in the pending bill which allows us to pass upon that question. If I cannot carry my measure, I am in favor of carrying that which will most nearly approximate to it. If I cannot carry anything that more nearly approaches the realization of my ideas, I will accept the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations.

I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] by striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu "$3,600" Mr. O'BRIEN. The insincerity, to say the least of it, of the argument of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] must be plainly evident to this House when we take into consideration the propositions which are now pending before the House in reference to appropria-tions from the public Treasury. Why, sir, the picayune sums that will be saved to the Treasury by a reduction which is not demanded by any public sentiment, in relation to propositions brought forward in this bill for the reduction of the salaries of members of Congress and the employes of the Government, become insignificant when compared with that mighty sum which will be taken from the Treastry by a scheme which I consider a gigantic fraud, and which my friend from Indiana [Mr. Holman] is already pledged to support.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is that?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I find him here on this floor willing to cut down salaries which have stood the test of a generation, which run all the way back to 1845 and 1852, and to do it in the interest of what he falsely calls a public sentiment in behalf of economy and retrenchfalsely calls a public sentiment in behalf of economy and retrenchment. I find him further advancing the insincere argument that the purpose is to prevent a raid upon the public Treasury, to save the people's money from being sacrificed by being given to members and other public officers in a proportion to which they are not entitled.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire what is the "gigantic fraud" to which he has referred?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I will tell the gentleman before I get through.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not forget it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I remember both historically and by experience since I have been a member of this House that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana (and I honor him to a certain extent in regard tleman from Indiana (and I honor him to a certain extent in regard to his course) has for fourteen years or longer been struggling here against adverse majorities, whether upon his own side or upon the other side of the House, advocating what he calls the principles of economy but what practically means compelling men to live upon wages which will not allow them decent attire or a respectable livelihood, thus exposing them in public life to vast temptations. I find that at last he seems to have succeeded. I find him here nominally that at last he seems to have succeeded. I find him here nominally the vice-chairman but practically the leader of your Appropriation Committee. [Laughter.] I find that he is flying the kite, the balance of the committee being but the tail of the kite; and on that kite is emblazoned his fourteen years' party shibboleth, "Economy!" At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I know that he is pledged to vote for a bill which if it should become a law (and it did pass the House at the least Congress) will in the estimation of some of the officers of the the last Congress) will in the estimation of some of the officers of the Government take $100,000,000 from the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. What bill is it?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I allude to the bounty bill which the gentleman from Indiana is pledged to support.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman mean the bill for the equalization of the bounties of the soldiers?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do.
Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly I am for that.
Mr. O'BRIEN. The gentleman did not attempt in the last Congress to cut down these salaries; and I say that if, as he says, this is a time of general paralysis of industry and business, and therefore the salaries of public officers, and particularly members of Congress, should be cut down, then in the name of Heaven why take from the Treasury $100,000,000, more or less, (I believe more,) at one swoop, under the form of bounties to soldiers.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. FOSTER. On what question?

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a point of order. I submit that debate is exhansted

The CHAIRMAN. Non constat that the gentleman from Indiana wishes to move that the committee rise.

Mr. PAGE. I object to debate on the amendment.
Mr. HOLMAN. Before making the motion which I design to make in a moment, that the committee rise, I must express my astonishment at the remarks

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Indiana has no right to debate

Mr. O'BRIEN. I hope unanimous consent will be given for the gentleman from Indiana to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to rule that the gentleman from Indiana is not in order in debating—Mr. HOAR. I do not object to the gentleman receiving leave of the committee to proceed—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] is also out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent for the gentleman from Indiana to proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. My point is that the proposition now pending is subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the floor to make any amendment which is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of enabling me to submit a few remarks—I have but a word to say—I move to amend the amendment to the original text by striking out $3,600 and inserting $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. There are already pending two amendments—one by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] to insert $5,000, and the other by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Douglas] to insert another sum.

Mr. ATKINS. By what right can the gentleman from Indiana make the motion that the committee rise? He has not charge of this bill. Mr. FOSTER. I have already made that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Ohio for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I understood the motion was to strike out the section. If that was not the motion, I am mistaken

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Indiana rose to a point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point is this: That according to my understanding the gentleman from Maryland moved to strike out the paragraph; the gentleman from Virginia then moved to strike out $4,500 and insert $3,600. I think that is a correct statement of the history of the pending propositions.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Maryland can state whether

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the position of the ques-

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from Indiana will renew my amendment at the close of his remarks, I will withdraw it.

Mr. PAGE and others objected to the withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the gentleman from Maryland moved to strike out the paragraph.

Am I correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland made no such motion. The Chair will state the proposition. The gentleman from Maryland moved to strike out a certain sum and insert another sum. The gentleman from Virginia moved to insert still another sum in lieu of the sum proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. That is all the amendment to the amendment which now can be considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe it is in order to move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I make that motion. I am opposed to striking out the paragraph, Mr. Chairman, but I avail myself of the courtesy of the committee in making that motion to submit some remarks, the remarks which I desired to submit a while ago.

Mr. HOAR. I wise to a question of order. The gentleman should

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman should not address the House until the other questions are settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot address us in opposition to his own amendment.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. HALE. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana. He is unused to the ways of the House, and it is almost impossible for him to get the floor, but if he will wait until to-morrow we will help him to get the floor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not stating any point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire at all to object to the gentleman from Indiana speaking, but I do not see why he should address the committee by its indulgence and give notice he is going to move the committee rise when he gets through so that no one can ask for the same indulgence to answer him.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not believe the gentleman from Indiana will make any such motion after he has concluded his remarks. I will take care that nobody shall be refused the opportunity, if he wishes it, to be heard on this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, I am sheltered by the chairman of the committee in saying he will take care no injustice shall be done. The gentleman from Massachusetts, if he understood what is going on, understood that I was simply proposing to move that the committee rise in consequence of the general disposition manifested in that regard. Why should I desire the committee to rise after submitting my remarks?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to say that I was greatly astonished at the remark which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] when he declared that the proposition to equalize the bounties of the men who fought our battles in the late war, upon whose perilous devotion and in consequence of whose great sacrifices the maintenance of this Union was solely dependent, to whom we owe the life of this Republic—when he characterized the effort on our part to equalize their bounties and to do them equal justice as a monstrous fraud. Mr. Chairman, those are words which ought not to have dropped from the gentleman. They are words which never should have fallen on the ears of this House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the gentleman allow me to say one word?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, for one word.

Mr. HOLMAN. 1 es, for one word.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was limited to five minutes, and had to put my words very close together. When I charged that bill with being what I considered to be a gigantic fraud, I did not mean to say that anything the soldiers would draw from it would necessarily be a fraud, or at all a fraud, but that in the distribution of the fund appropriated by that bill it would be absolutely a fraud upon the Treasury and a fraud upon the soldiers. and a fraud upon the soldiers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad that my friend makes even a lame apology.

Mr. O'BRIEN. No, sir; no apology at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. An apology for so unfit a word! I am astonished as a citizen of this Republic that an effort to do justice to these men, to their widows and orphan children, should be so characterized. I regard that measure as appealing more strongly to the sense of justice of this Government, independent of the patriotic emotions of the country to which appeal is made, with more irresistible force than any other claim which can be made upon this Government from its foundation to the present hour, except that which we owe to the men whose heroism and sacrifice established our Government. One strong motive which actuates me now in any humble effort I may make to retrench the expenses of the Government is that the Treasury may be in condition to meet the demands of that bounty equalization bill. For I trust, sir, that it will pass this House with the unanimity it did at the last session of Congress. Instead of its calling for $100,000,000, it is well known it will take from our Treasury at the outside during a period of some three years about $29,000,000, and I indulge the hope, if this House can come up to the statesman-like proposition submitted by the gentleman from Virginia, to fix the pay of members of Con-gress at a fair and reasonable rate, and the other expenditures of the Government shall be brought down to a fair and reasonable basis— to a just and reasonable compensation for service rendered to this Government-that the sum required to meet this bounty will be more than saved during this present session of Congress. If the whole $29,000,000 were to be withdrawn at once, still the expenditures would not be equal to the appropriations for the present fiscal year.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Springer having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Cox reported that the Commit-tee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution

JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News

CONFIRMATION OF TITLE

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2850) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Ains-WORTH for four weeks on account of business.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Bass for ten days on account of ill health.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Burch-ARD, of Wisconsin, for ten days from Monday next.

W. T. PATE.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers, petition, and claim in the case of W. T. Pate.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken on Mr. Page's motion, there were—ayes on noes 31.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—yeas 29, noes 89.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn. I do not desire to stay here until the roll is called.

Mr. SAYLER. If the gentleman from California withdraws the motion that the House adjourn over until Monday I renew it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the pending question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. Is not the motion that the House do now adjourn in order at this stage?

Mr. RUSK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has raised a question of order, which he has the right to do.

Mr. PAGE. I proposed to withdraw the motion that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] renewed it, and so it stands now. And the House has ordered the roll to be called on the question of adjournment to Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] the Chair decides that a motion to fix a day to which an adjournment shall take place has precedence over a motion to adjourn, and this question has been ordered to be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRISON. Was there a quorum present on the vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum did not vote.

Mr. MORRISON. As no quorum is present, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. Upon the motion to adjourn over until Monday I believe a quorum voted, but on the question of ordering the yeas and nays there was not a quorum.

nays there was not a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules provide that one-fifth of those present may determine the ordering of the yeas and nays, rether provide a quorum is present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 72, nays 61, not voting 156; as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the question that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, the yeas are 72 and the navs are 61.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that that is not a quo-

The motion has not been agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The motion is lost, no quorum having voted.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that on the question of fixing the time to which the House shall adjourn no quorum is necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to differ from the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the rule on page 5, which says:

But when less than a quorum is present no motion can be entertained except a motion to adjourn or for a call of the House.

The motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn has failed for want of a quorum voting.

Mr. HOAR. This is a very important question and quite worth considering. A motion to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn is pertinent to a motion to adjourn. Is it possible that if ten men got here at the beginning of Congress, they could not fix the time to which they should adjourn. The power to adjourn over is involved in the power of the House to adjourn, and it has been so ruled a hundred times.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided that point. Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and, on a division, there were-ayes 47,

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SAYLER. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and on a division, there were—ayes 74,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the suggestion that to-morrow be set apart for debate upon any subject.

Mr. PAGE, and Mr. BAKER of Indiana, objected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to ad-

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the Chair having decided that the motion was agreed to and the decision having been announced to the House, it is too late for the gentleman to call for the yeas and nays. I will state further on the point of order that the Chair had entertained another motion. After having decided that the motion to adjourn over was adopted, the Chair accepted at the hands of the gentleman from Pennsylvania another proposal and submitted it to the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked that the House should meet to-morrow for debate only, which was subsequent to the decision of the Chair that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that no one will object to having a session to-morrow for debate. There are a great many gentlemen here who want to address the House, and I think it unkind for any gentleman

Mr. RANDALL. My proposition is for general debate on any subject

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a statement. I rose at the same time the gentleman from Pennsylvania did for the purpose of calling for the yeas and nays. The gentleman from Pennsylvania began to submit his proposition to the House that to-morrow should be set apart for general debate only.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. To save trouble I will withdraw my objection to a session for debate to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to state the facts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania began to make his proposition and I did not at once call for the yeas and nays. It was not until some gentleman objected to a session to-morrow that I made the call, so that the gentleman from a session to-morrow that I made the can, so that the gentleman from Kentucky was correct in making his statement.

Mr. RANDALL. What I propose is that the session to-morrow shall be for debate on any subject, with the understanding that no business shall be done.

Mr. PAGE and Mr. HOAR objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] that it is in order and competent for the yeas and nays to be demanded upon the motion to adjourn over, no business having intervened. The Chair was interrupted by a point of order, and the Chair holds that the call for the yeas and nays was in time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Chair permit me on the point of order simply to say that the gentleman from Indiana has himself just stated that the point of order made by myself was well taken; that the Chair had announced that decision on the motion to adjourn over, chair had announced that decision on the motion to adjourn over, and that subsequent business intervened, which was the request made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for unanimous consent; and that upon the Chair submitting that request to the House and objection being made upon the other side, then, and not until then, did the gentleman from Indiana call for the yeas and nays; so that the Chair had decided the question, if the gentleman from Indiana is correct, before his call for the yeas and nays and had entertained the request of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER protempore. The Chair heard the call for the yeas and nays before the other request was made.

and nays before the other request was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is only mistaken in one respect, and that is as to my conceding that his point of order was well taken. I stated that when I called for the yeas and nays I did not do it at once. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] rose at the same time, and I admit that I heard some gentleman object to his proposition before I called for the yeas and nays. If in this state of facts I was in time, then I insist on the call. I did not call at once. not call at once. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made a proposition first, which was objected to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the call withdrawn or insisted on?

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to say that if my objection to a session for debate to-morrow is the only thing that stands in the way of closing the matter, I will withdraw the ob-

I will suggest that if any gentleman has any remarks but I will not withdraw my objection to a session to-morrow.

Mr. BEEBE. I understand that the House has already ordered that when it adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the order of the House, the call for the yeas and nays not being insisted upon.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I move that the House do now adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, a communication from George R. Cecil, second lieutenant Thirteenth Infantry, relative to the reduction of the pay of second lieutenants, giving his objections thereto, with an indorsement by his post commander; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Commissary-General of Sub sistence, dated the 20th instant, asking for an early appropriation of $300,000 on account of subsistence of the Army for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1876, with authority to expend the amount appropriated during the current fiscal year, to enable the Subsistence Department to purchase supplies for the remote posts in Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Montana, and Dakota, during the months of April and May, 1876, in order to reach those posts early in the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented two petitions of citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania; two petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Dauphin County, Pennsylvania; two petitions of workingmen of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania; three petitions of workingmen of Lawrence County, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania; sylvania; a petition of workingmen of Berks County, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Lehigh County, Pennsylvania; and a petition of workingmen of Bedford County, Pennsylvania, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Samuel Riddle, William Simpson, John Ledward, J. P. Crozier, and 620 other manufacturers, mechanics, and citizens of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act reducing the duties on imported articles that enter into competition with American manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the memorial of workingmen of Passaic, New Jersey, remonstrating against the proposed change in the tariff laws. I observe they say in their petition that while they are ready to bear with resolution their share of the depression which exists all over the world, that resolution will be changed to despair if the proposed tariff bill passes. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of pensioners of the United States, residing in New Jersey, praying that Congress in deference to their interests will not pass a law changing the present mode of paying pensions; which was referred to the Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

Mr. KERNAN presented a petition of the Lodge of Good Templars of Brooklyn, New York, praying for the prohibition of the manufac-ture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of T. M. Eddy, William Ross, and other citizens of New York, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the memorial of John G. Reither, Edward T. Jackson, and 11 other business men of Brooklyn, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William M. Whitney and George He also presented the petition of William M. Whitney and George T. May, praying for a just and equitable disposition of the money awarded to the United States by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of the First Methodist church of Chelsea, Massachusetts, signed by pastor and officers, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors, that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service, and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of Rev. H. T. Cheever, H. R. Greene, and other citizens of Worcester, Massachusetts, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts in regard to the metric system of weights and measures, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported and referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six.

Resolution in favor of the introduction of the metric system of weights and measures.

Resolved. That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth are hereby requested to forward by all legitimate means the introduction of the metric system of weights and measures as the sole legalized standard throughout the United States.

Resolved, That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of the foregoing resolution.

House of Representatives, March 3, 1876.

HENRY B. PEIRCE, Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented a memorial of the bar of East Saginaw, Michigan, in reference to the Federal courts in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of J. C. Penberthy and other citizens of Wisconsin, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of M. F. Taylor and other citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Isaac Herring, of Polk County, Iowa, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition and remonstrance of sundry citizens of Washington, against railroads on the public grounds, &c., which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I introduced last week a bill for the removal of ings and Grounds. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection and that change of reference will be made. This petition will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial signed by many business men, leading citizens of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York, saying that they observe with alarm the introduction of a scheme for tariff reduction and revision; which, in very earnest language, they protest against. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Weisiger & Co., A. L. Allett & Co., and other merchants and business men of Richmond, Virginia, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a communication from Governor Kemper, of Virginia, transmitting resolutions of the General Assembly, and the petition of the Virginia Military Institute, praying compensation for building, library, and scientific apparatus burned by order of General Hunter, commanding United States troops, during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAXEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives to urge upon Congress the early and favorable consideration of the claims upon the people's gratitude of those who rendered service in the Army and Navy of the United States in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

• Mr. MAXEY. I also present the petition of John G. Walker, of Texas, praying for the removal of his political disabilities. I will say that I have known General Walker since 1846, and he is an honorable gentleman. I commend his prayer to the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which I move that the petition be referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE presented three petitions from citizens of Mifflin County, Pennsylvania, praying that the tariff laws may be undisturbed for the present; which were referred to the Committee on Fi-in the petition. The petition is short, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

ica in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do respectfully and humbly petition your honorable bodies, and would represent that during the civil war of 1861 we abandoned for the time being our civic avocations and entered the military service of our country, and that during our connection with the Army, and while in the line of our duty as citizen-soldiers of the United States, we were the recipients of many severe wounds, and that we have each of us lost an eye.

And we would further respectfully represent that the loss of an eye secured for the "Roman soldier Flavius an augmentation of his pay, the civic crown, and other honors;" that in modern times such disfigurement is deemed a fit subject of reproach, and often hinders employment; that we regard the disfigurement from which we suffer, both bodily and mentally, as fully equivalent to the loss of a limb. We therefore earnestly and respectfully petition your honorable bodies that each of us may be furnished with an artificial eye, or in lieu thereof commutation in money for same equal to that now received by soldiers who have lost a limb.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of a repeal of the amendment to the postal laws increasing the rates of postage on third-class mail matter from one cent per two ounces to one cent per ounce; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented six memorials of the workingmen of Jefferson, Vinton, Perry, Ashtabula, Lawrence, and Belmont Counties, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against any immediate alteration of the tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present the memorial of the National Board of Trade, praying that a committee be appointed on commercial relations between the United States and Canada. If I may be indulged, as this memorial is now, when I will read it. this memorial is very short, I will read it:

Memorial of the National Board of Trade of the United States to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The National Board of Trade respectfully petitions the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives that the President of the United States be authorized to appoint, at an early day, a commission of not less than five merchants and business men, familiar with the subject, to confer on the part of the United States with a like commission on the part of the Dominion of Canada on the subject of a treaty for reciprocal trade and commercial relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada; said joint commission to be authorized on the part of their respective governments to suggest and recommend the details of provisions for such treaty, subject to the concurrence of the respective Governments of the United States, the Dominion of Canada, and of Great Britain.

Respectfully submitted, by order and on behalf of the National Board of Trade.

FREDERICK FRALEY, of Philadelphia,

President.

CHARLES RANDOLPH, of Chicago, Secretary. Washington, February, 1876.

I submit with this memorial the letter transmitting it from the secretary of the National Board of Trade, and I move that both papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of 37 citizens of the State of Illinois, praying Congress for the removal of the two-cent United States stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of 154 pensioners of the State of Illinois, in favor of the present system of paying pensions; which was referred to the Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

He also presented the petition of David H. H. Sims, a soldier in the war of 1861, praying to be allowed a pension for wounds received while charging works at Fort Blakely, Alabama; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Decatur, Illinois, praying Congress to maintain the present rate of duty on linseed and linseed oil; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of H. A. Mills, and 38 other citizens of Mount Carroll, Illinois, praying Congress for the removal of the two-cent United States stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Harris B. Lovell, of Kane, Greene County, Illinois, formerly a private in the One hundred and twenty-second Regiment of Illinois Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORTON presented the memorial of William H. English and other citizens of Indiana, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of James G. Naylor, praying that he may be allowed to complete the work of building the "Western market," in the city of Washington, in accordance with his contract heretofore made with the District commissioners; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1589) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 422) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate directing that committee to inquire into some mode of bringing the Post-Office Department nearer to a self-sustaining basis, reported a bill (S. No. 650) fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter, and for other purposes; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs of Uriah Forrest, deceased, asking such herislation as will authorize newment to the estate of said deep.

such legislation as will authorize payment to the estate of said decedent of the amount of half-pay allowed by law for services rendered by him in the war of the Revolution, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Wade Hopkins, of Mississippi, sole surviving heir of Colonel David Hopkins, late of South Carolina, deceased, praying for commutation of half pay as officer in the revolutionary war, and for re-imbursement of certain moneys advanced by Colonel David Hopkins in aid of the war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Rebecca Frances Bailey, only child and heir at law of Lieutenant Edward Lloyd, deceased, of the Continental Line, for half pay for life due Lieutenant Lloyd, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 203) for the relief of John L. Buck, of Pine Bluff, Arkansas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John T. Tayler, late private of Company M, First Maryland Cavalry Volunteers, praying to have his army record corrected by the removal therefrom of the charge of desertion, reported adversely thereon; and the report was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 296) to equalize fees allowed attorneys for collecting pay or bounty, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 216) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 13, to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved

September 24, 1789.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the gentleman to give way that I may make a report or two from the Committee on Military Affairs, as reports are in order now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the bill is taken up I will give way for any morning business. I want to get it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not concluded yet. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor if he rises with a report.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Lovel Moore, of Florida, praying compensation for services as a soldier in the Army of the United States during the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be wrinted. as agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel H. Leavitt, late Company C, Eighty-sixth New York Volunteers, praying payment of arrears of pay as lieutenant, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. KERNAN. I should like that report to lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The printed, if there be no objection. The report will lie on the table and

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 336) to authorize the construction of a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River, from some feasible point in La Crosse County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Houston County, in the State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Lieutenant Isaac S. Lyon, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 291) for the relief of Francisco V.

De Coster, to report adversely.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that that may go on the Calendar. I think a bill was passed very much like it the other day. I should like to have time to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 126) to restore appointments and promo-tions to the Pay Department of the Army, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds, direct me to report the same back with one amendment. I ought to say I think that but for the fact that the Senator from New Jersey and one or two other Senators have signified a wish to take up other bills this morning, I would ask that this bill be considered now. I will ask at an early time, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, that it may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Cal-

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 726) to change the name of the steamboat Charles W. Mead, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d day of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein, to report it without amendment, with the recommendation that it pass. I will state that this bill simply provides for sending the papers which were in the supreme courts of the Territories to the district courts of the Territories, upon which jurisdiction in bank-ruptcy has been conferred by law. The jurisdiction was taken from the supreme courts of the Territories, but there was no provision for transmitting the papers in the cases there pending to the district courts; and the consequence is that the supreme courts of the Territories cannot proceed for want of jurisdiction, and the district courts cannot proceed for want of papers. The bill simply provides for transferring the papers, and there can be no objection whatsoever to it. I will state further, that whether the bankrupt law be repealed or not repealed, this bill ought to pass; for any repeal or proposed repeal I suppose would save pending cases. This bill is therefore necessary whether the bankrupt law be repealed or be not repealed. I ask that the bill may be put on its passage. I see no reason why there should be any delay.

Mr. MORTON. That bill, I think, will lead to some discussion. I gave notice last week that I would this morning ask the Senate to take up and dispose of the resolution to investigate the election in Mississippi; and if there is no motion pending I now move to proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has not expired, and there is unfinished business which comes up after the morning

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not object to the present consideration of this bill. There cannot be any discussion upon it, for the bill simply provides to transfer the papers from a court that has lost jurisdiction to a court that has jurisdiction. What discussion can that give rise to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? Does the Senator from Indiana object?

Mr. MORTON. I inquire if there is a motion pending?
Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which I have just reported.

Mr. MORTON. I move to amend the motion by inserting the Mississippi resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Indiana objects, the bill cannot be taken up. Mr. MORTON. I object, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

APRIL 14.

Mr. SPENCER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of John M. Langston, John F. Cook, and others, praying that a holiday may be allowed employes of the Government Departments on April 14, 1876, to enable them to attend the ceremony of inaugurating a monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, to report a joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday, was read three times, and passed. The preamble recites that on the 14th day of April next, a statue secured by the contributions of the freedmen of the country to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, will be unveiled with appropriate ceremonies in Lincoln Park, Washington City, District of Columbia; and that all persons desir-ing to do so should be given the opportunity of attending such exercises, thus by their presence honoring the memory of our martyred President. The resolution therefore provides that all persons employed in the various Departments of the Government situated in the District of Columbia be granted a general holiday on the 14th day of April, 1876.

MORAN'S PAINTINGS AT THE CENTENNIAL.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to send two paintings by Thomas Moran to be exhibited at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, instruct me to report it back, with an an amendment, and to recommend its passage; and as it will take but a moment I presume, I ask for its present con-

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on the Library, with an amendment to strike out all after the word "authorized," in line 4, and insert:

To permit Thomas Moran to exhibit at the international exposition at Philadelphia the two paintings executed by himself, entitled "The Cañons of the Yellowstone" and the "Chasms of the Colorado:" Provided, The said Moran shall cause the same to be insured to the satisfaction of the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress for the benefit of the United States against loss by accident or otherwise, and shall return the same to their places in the Capitol on or before the 1st day of December next.

So as to read:

That the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress be, and they are hereby, authorized to permit, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 651) to provide that all pensions on account of death, wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States since March 4, 1861, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted on application filed previous to January 1, 1880, shall commence from the date of death or discharge, and for the payment of the arrears of pensions; which was read twice by its title, Mr. EDMUNDS. I introduce this bill to oblige some worthy gentlemen interested in it, but without expressing any opinion in favor of it myself. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 652) for the relief of certain officers of the line of the Army who have been unlawfully overslaughed and deprived of promotion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 653) relative to promotions in the line of artillery, cavalry, and infantry; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed. He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 654) to amend section 3755 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 655) to confirm to the city of San José, in the State of California, the title to certain lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 656) granting a pension to W. R. Browne; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensional Colorada and advantage of the committee of the committee on Pensional Colorada and advantage of the committee o sions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 657) for the relief of Thomas F. Ryan and Charles J. Knighton; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. I introduce by request this bill, the merits of which I am not acquainted with. I move its reference to the Committee on

Mr. KERNAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 658) extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KERNAN. I introduce this bill by request. I do not know anything of its merits. In order to show it to some officers it is desirable to have it printed. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 659) giving the Court of Claims jurisdic-tion to hear and determine the claim of William T. Pate and Silas Q.

Howe for taxes twice paid; which was read twice by its title, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 660) for the relief of H. K. Randall and others, for damages to their property on Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the District of

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 13) requesting the President of the United States to accept the invitation of Peru to join in a conference of the governments of North and South America with a view to the amelioration and codification of international law; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 661) to provide for the organization. ization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for the better protection of the Indian tribes therein; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That Jennie L. Wall have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate on leaving copies of the same.

AWARD BY VENEZUELA.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to inform the Senate how much money, if any, there is in the hands of his Department paid by the government of Venezuela on account of awards of the mixed commission between the Government of the United States and the government of Venezuela under treaty of April 25, 1866; and what objection, if any, there be to the distribution of any amounts now in his hands to the holders of said certificates of award.

Mr.FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to give notice that to-morrow morn ing, as soon as the common business is over, I will call up Senate bill No. 13. I wish to say that that bill was up and was about being put upon its passage, when, at the request of a number of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber principally, who wished to consider it, it was postponed, and has been postponed from time to time. I also wish to say that I propose to modify the bill in consequence of conferring with some who are opposed to it, and I think it will then meet the approval perhaps of all the Senators. At all events, I wish them to-morrow morning to give me an opportunity of having the bill considered, as it was waived for their consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator not submit his modification

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir. I propose to strike out all after the word "writs," in the fourteenth line, on the second page. The effect of the bill then will be simply this: Where a State officer refuses to execute the mandate of the court, the court has the power to appoint some one to execute that mandate, not interfering in any manner with the rights of the States or with their power of taxation.

I will explain the bill when it is brought up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I feel bound to say to the Senator that there is an appropriation bill, which has met the consideration of the Senate for half a day or so, which it is very important should pass at the earliest moment. I hope therefore the Senator will take into con-

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that any bill is subject to an appropriation bill, when the chairman of that committee insists

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORTON. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the Consideration of the Mississippi resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Morron December 15,

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, whereby the freedom of the ballot was in a great measure destroyed, a reign of terror established, ballot-boxes stuffed, spurious

tickets imposed upon voters, so that a popular majority of more than 25,000 was overcome, and in its place was given an apparent but fraudulent majority of more than 25,000; and whereas the Legislature thus chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body; and whereas if these allegations are true a great number of the citizens of the United States have had their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of the said allegations and the circumstances attending said election, with power to visit said State to make their investigations, to send for persons and papers, and to use all necessary process in the performance of their duties; and to make report to the Senate before the end of this session of their investigation and findings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand that the resolution is on its passage? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on its passage.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Before that question is put, I wish to offer an amendment making it somewhat more definite.

This resolution, with its present recitals, would seem to imply—although I do not know that was the intention of the Senator from Indiana in presenting it—that the Senate would have power to incit. Indiana in presenting it—that the Senate would have power to institute this inquiry for the purpose of inquiring into the election of State officers, members of the State Legislature, or members of the other House. While I am anxious to have the information called for by this resolution in some authentic form, I do not feel that I have any right to demand it for any prying curiosity of mine or on any ground except as it may have some legitimate bearing upon some matter over which the Senate has a right to act in its legislative or its executive capacity. In order to avoid that difficulty, I send to the Chair a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, and ask that it may be read, and I hope the Senator from Indiana will accept the substitute in place of the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi, in 1875, for members of Congress and State officers and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds committed upon and violence exercised toward the colored citizens of that State and the white citizens disposed to support their rights at the election, and especially that the colored voters, on account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were by intimidation and force deterred from voting or compelled to vote contrary to their wishes for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed, and their right to the free exercise of the elective franchise as secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution thus practically denied and violated, and that such intimidation has been since continued for the purpose of affecting future elections; and whereas the people of all the United States have an interest in and a right to insist upon the enforcement of this constitutional amendment, and Congress, having the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot properly neglect the duty of providing the necessary legislation for this purpose: Therefore,

**Resolved**, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of these allegations and to inquire how far these constitutional rights have in the said election been violated by force, fraud, or intimidation, and to inquire and report to the Senate before the end of the present session whether any, and, if so, what, further legislation is necessary to secure to said colored citizens the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights, and that said committee be empowered to visit said State, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony on oath, and to use all necessary process for these purposes.

Mr. MORTON. If I understand the amendment correctly, I think

Mr. MORTON. If I understand the amendment correctly, I think under it the whole investigation can be made, and it puts beyond question the constitutional power of the Senate to make the inquiry. I am willing, therefore, to accept the amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Before the question is put I wish to say a few vords upon the resolution.

Upon the grounds and for the purposes stated in this substitute I can vote for the committee of inquiry; and shall do so, with the hope that, when that inquiry shall be had and all the facts are before us, the result may show that the rumors and reports of the wrongs and outrages complained of have been greatly exaggerated, and that the inquiry may thus tend to allay, rather than increase, public excitement, and to promote harmony rather than discord between the different sections of the Union. I will not now undertake to prejudge the facts or the evidence. I have all along since the close of the war felt the strongest and the warmest sympathy for our southern fellow-citizens and the most ardent desire for the promotion of their prosperity and welfare, which it has seemed to me could only be secured by kindness, forbearance, magnanimity and conciliation. I have been disposed to judge them with more liberality, to put a more favorable construction upon their actions and motives, and to make more allowance for their prejudices, their habits, and occasional outbreaks of passion and even violence than most men of the political organization with which I have gener-ally agreed and acted. In judging of all these things I put myself in their place, and ask myself if our positions had been reversed and we of the North had been born and raised in the South, with the education, habits, modes of thought, and prejudices incident to their situation, and we, like them, had been the losing party in the great death-struggle of the war, how much better we should have been likely to conduct ourselves in the matter of reconstruction and reconciliation than they have done. This consideration, it is true, will not excuse a general and preconcerted defiance of the Constitution or of any of its amendments or of the laws passed in pursuance of it, nor any general movement or conspiracy, by violence or intimidation, to deprive the colored citizens or those who choose to act with them of the free exercise of the right of suffrage secured to them by the Constitution and laws. But, when we consider that the South suffered much more severely than we did by the war; that their people had been educated with quite different ideas of society and government; that, by the abolition of slavery and giving the right of suffrage to those who had been so recently their slaves, their whole peculiar social system was suddenly torn asunder, and the opinions, prejudices, habits and modes of thought, under the influence of which they had grown up to manhood, necessarily disregarded; and when we reflect that the habits, opinions, and prejudices of generations cannot be suddenly changed by reason or by law; we must feel that we had no right to expect that the new order of things, conducted upon other ideas and principles from theirs, would move on smoothly and harmoniously from the first, nor without some jarring, some collisions. Some conflicts between the old and the new ideas, the old and the new systems, must naturally be expected, and due allowance should be made for errors and faults incident to the situation, until, by kindness, forbearance, and magnanimity, time should soften down asperities and make us one homogeneous people.

Such has been my hope, my most ardent desire; for until this shall be accomplished there can be no general prosperity in any portion of the Union, no safety, no solid and enduring peace. My ardent desire for such a consummation may have swayed my judgment and led me to judge our southern brethren too leniently. I hope not; for if it be a delusion it is one so in consonance with all the better impulses of my nature that I must cling to it until the unwelcome evidence compels its rejection. I did believe from the utterances and professions of the representative men throughout the South and of those in the North in political affiliation with them, as well as the professions of North in political affiliation with them, as well as the professions of southern Senators here at the last regular session of this body, that the constitutional amendments and the necessary laws for carrying them into full effect had been accepted in good faith, as the final result of the war; and that, though there might be local exhibitions of hostility and some local conflicts, yet that all idea of general resistance had been abandoned. But if the evidence upon this inquiry shall show that, instead of some merely local and sporadic outbreaks of violence and intimidation, there has been anything like general concert of action throughout the State of alarge part of the State for syscert of action throughout the State, or a large part of the State, for systematically intimidating colored voters and those who were inclined to vote with them, for the deliberate and common purpose of depriving them of the right of suffrage guaranteed by the Constitution, no one will, no one can, regret it more than I shall. And if future developments should show that such a determination exists generally among the white population of the Southern States, and there should appear to be a concert of action in such a common purpose, I shall be compelled to admit what I have thus far refused to admit, that the war is, indeed, not yet over. For, though there is the kindest feeling among almost all classes and all parties in the North toward their southern brethren, and there is nothing in their power they would not do to promote the prosperity of the South while the latter shows a disposition to submit in good faith to the results of the war and to abide by the constitutional amendments; they are not willing to give up all the results of the war, gained at the cost of so much blood and treasure, and that, too, with the prospect of another like bloody contest to secure the same result.

In this last quarter of the nineteenth century, after so much progress has elsewhere, as well as here, been made in the abolition of slavery and in the elevation of the oppressed, those men are simply insane who think that the people of the United States will permit a single backward step in the march of freedom, or that they will ever cease their efforts to secure the enjoyment of equal rights to all men, without reference to race or color, until every man, white or black, throughout every State, shall receive the equal protection of the laws, and be allowed to east his vote according to his own good-will and pleasure, with none to molest or make him afraid. But as yet I will indulge in no gloomy apprehension of any such general movement or designs on the part of our southern fellow-citizens, but still indulge the hope that I have not been mistaken in their intention to abide by the constitutional amendments in good faith, and that this inquiry may tend to establish that fact rather than to refute it.

I have the less fear of the success of any general movement by any great party, for the repeal or nullification of those amendments, because, though there may be great numbers of men in the South who desire to go into such a movement, their representative men have certainly too much intelligence not to see that any party which should dare to place itself upon any such ground, in any of the Northern States, or to favor it after coming into power upon any other issue, would thereby sound its own death-knell, and become a stench and a by-word to the nation for all future time; and that every man who favored it would pray, but vainly pray, that his dastard act might be shrouded in oblivion, lest his descendants to the tenth generation might inherit his infamy. No, Mr. President, (as you have heard me say before,) upon this question, all parties at the North have given bonds to fate. None want another war, and all understand that, sooner or later, that would be the inevitable result of again opening those dangerous questions by the repeal or nullification of these amend-

But there are still other grounds for the hope I have expressed as to the result of this inquiry. I take it for granted that the people of Mississippi have common sense and ordinary sagacity, upon matters pertaining to their own interest; and it seems to me obviously against their interests and destructive of their welfare to keep up the sharp line of division and bitter hostility between the different classes of voters, and to inaugurate a state of chronic internecine war between the holders of property and the population upon whose labor they must chiefly rely for the material prosperity of the State; and they must know, or ought to know, that in the matter of influencing or con-trolling the colored voters, habitual kindness, for bearance, and persuasion and the various humane resources of superior intelligence will in the end accomplish much better and greater results than powder and ball, and will melt down barriers against which artillery would thunder in vain.

Again, it seems difficult to believe that the very people who have so recently and so eloquently denounced military interference and intimidation at elections should now, of their own accord, inaugurate a system of violence and intimidation in elections still more cruel and ble to much greater abuses.

No, Mr. President, sober facts and stern realities, established upon clear testimony, can alone deprive me of the hopes I have expressed. And now, Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say, that in the views I have expressed, I have been influenced by no merely party interest or partisan consideration whatever, and that, upon the principle and the merits of any question touching the restoration of peace and har-mony between the different sections of the Union, no merely partisan success or partisan consideration shall ever sway my action the weight of a single hair. If, in the main, I shall act, as it is probable I shall, with one party rather than the other, it will be only because (and so long as) I think the principles and measures of that party the most likely to promote the permanent public good. But the public good, as God shall give me to see it, instead of the interests of party, shall be my sole guide. Party interests are temporary: the nation is for all time. These questions are so momentous and the interests involved so vital to the present and future welfare of the entire nation, that, in my estimation, they are as far above mere party politics as heaven is above hell; and to sacrifice, or even to imperil, any of these great interests for merely party success, would be a crime alike against God, against the nation, and humanity itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has accepted the substitute. The question is on the resolution as modified. Mr. COOPER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. Mr. MORTON. I think we can have a vote without any delay. I move to vertexe the present and all prior orders for the purpose of move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the Mississippi resolution and disposing of it. I think we can do it in a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. The Senator from Indiana moves the post-ponement of this and all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the Mississippi resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall strenuously resist that unless it is distinctly understood that if the vote is not taken in a few minutes we shall go on with the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I think we can get a vote soon.

Mr. SARGENT. If it is understood that, in case this resolution is to be debated on either side, it will be laid aside for the unfinished business, I will not object; but an indefinite postponement I should feel called upon from my duty to the business of the Senate to object

Mr. WITHERS. I think it may be safely assumed that the proposition will be debated.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely rise to ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan be printed. It touches a matter of the very gravest importance, of the highest and, as I think, most dangervery gravest importance, or the ingless and, as I think, host dangerous exercise of alleged constitutional power by the Congress of the United States. On the mere reading of such a paper from the desk of the Clerk from the manuscript presented it is quite impossible to comprehend its entire effect. I should also say that, having great respect for the ability and fairness of the Scuator from Michigan, I would be very glad to read his remarks before making any comment upon them. The low tone of voice in which he delivered them rendered them inaudible to a great portion of the Senators. For that reason I trust the Senator from Indiana will not press the consideration of the question at all, either on his original resolution or on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, but that the regular order will be proceeded with in accordance with the motion of the Senator from California. The question cannot be passed on without discus-

Mr. MORTON. This matter has been before the Senate for a long time, and Senators have had opportunities of considering the question in all its constitutional bearings. The form in which the Senator from Michigan has put the resolution, it seems to me, takes away the last pretense that it is not within the constitutional power of the Senate to make the investigation; and, as I think the adoption of this resolution is of more importance now than any other measure that will come before the Senate for a brief period, I ask that the question be put on my motion to postpone.

Mr. SARGENT. ·I am willing to be instructed by the Senate; but I should really like to know, at the threshold of the business which the Committee on Appropriations are bringing forward, whether the ordinary course of the Senate will still be pursued, so that we can have the consideration of the appropriation bills which we have prepared. The Appropriation Committee during the last week were quite liberal; they gave way for the consideration of a bill in which the Senator from Indiana took a very natural interest, and which certainly ator from Indiana took a very natural interest, and which certainly was an important one; day after day I waited until that bill could be disposed of, giving notice, however, that as soon as it was disposed of I would ask that this important appropriation bill might be considered. I do not say that the appropriation bills are the only important business of the country; but there are so many of them that they must have way, or they will fail to pass. I shall look upon it as somewhat in the nature of a test whether it is desired that we shall press these bills, as we have done heretofore, on the attention of the Senate, at this session, at every comportantly. Senate, at this session, at every opportunity.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator before he takes his seat inform me whether the Committee on Appropriations have any other bill from the House now before them?

Mr. SARGENT. Not any other now before them; several are in committees of conference, however.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is no other appropriation bill before the committee?

Mr. SARGENT. No. The one in the most state of forwardness is the legislative appropriation bill, which we hope to get soon.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is in the House. While I individually wish to be guided by the Appropriation Committee, it does not seem to me that we are now in a condition to anticipate any pressure in relation to the appropriation bills; and inasmuch as this other matter is one that has been long before the Senate, it does seem to me just and appropriate that we consider it, and that we shall do no injustice to the Appropriation Committee if we so vote, at the same time holding it to be a rule which will generally guide me to sustain that committee in getting its bills before the Senate, certainly whenever there is pressure or a want of time for the consideration of those bills.

Mr. SARGENT. One of the chief evils of legislation on appropriation bills heretofore has been that they have been crowded into the very last of the session on almost any excuse. The Senate will ad-journ at half past two or three o'clock when those bills, which they say are so long pending, are ready for consideration, taking no action upon them; and week after week goes by, and month after month, until finally the Committee on Appropriations find themselves pressed in the last two weeks or the last week of the session with important business on their hands. Is it any wonder that there is careless legislation in them? Is it any wonder that the service is injured and that the Treasury is unnecessarily drawn upon? It is so year after year. Last year we succeeded, by persistently insisting, in getting some of the appropriation bills out of the way before that last period. Nevertheless the sundry civil bill and the deficiency bill, both of which ought to have been disposed of a fortnight before, were left to the very last night of the session.

It seems to me that in this very important bill the other House-as I shall call the attention of the Senate if I have the opportunity have entirely changed the foreign service; they have struck out consuls and reduced the salaries of ministers; and where a bill is before us, which, if adopted as it comes here, will have, as I believe, a baneful operation upon our foreign commerce and our foreign interests, we ought to take it up, and take it up in season, and consider it de-liberately, and determine whether such innovations ought to be made. I have no doubt it is a bill that will lead to a great deal of discussion. It ought to be discussed very fully pro and con. If there are any who can give reasons for the shape in which this bill reaches us from the other House, I am certainly anxious to hear them; and I have no doubt that many Senators, on the other hand, desire to give good reasons why the service should be maintained in something like its integrity for the sake of the business of the country. It is not like the ordinary appropriation bills heretofore reported; but it is an attempt at an entirely new departure, which requires careful consideration either to resist or to adopt. It seems to me that it ought to be taken up and considered at this time.

There is a probability that the various appropriation bills which we shall receive will contain very much this same question; that is to say, the service will be so changed, will be so mutilated by those appropriation bills, that a great deal more time than usual has got to be given to their consideration. They cannot be passed over in a few hours. The changes are not merely in principle, but in details, and time must be taken in order to do justice to the bills and justice

I consider it my duty to insist that we proceed with the unfinished business. Of course I am but one, and can only give my own vote; but I must say that I shall feel somewhat governed in my course hereafter by what action the Senate may take now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The appropriation bill is undoubtedly important; the Government cannot go on without it. The resolution of the Sentaken place which it is publicly alleged have and are allowed to go on it that way and spread into other States, we shall not have any Government in a little while that will need any appropriation bills at all. Both these matters are of great importance; but, inasmuch as one of them is of that kind of importance which ought to require speedy inquiry in order either to vindicate the people of Mississippi from a very widespread suspicion, or to ascertain what the tru(h may be if that suspicion is well founded, I believe it is our imperative duty to dispose of this resolution, which ought not to take more than a few hours. I cannot conceive any ground upon which, fairly conducted, it ought to occupy any considerable length of time. There will be plenty of time then to take up this bill about appropriations and to dispose of it. We have not fixed any day for the adjournment; we are under no pressure at this present time; but matters in the State of Mississippi, as they have been reported, and I certainly hope untruly, are in such a condition as to demand an inquiry, as it appears to me, on the part of Congress; but of course I dannot go into any discussion of the merits of either of these measures except so far as to show the importance of them. Now, therefore, although I almost always stand by the Committee on Appropriations, I s all feel compelled to vote in favor of the motion of the Senator from

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is not only a rule, but the necessity is admitted usually, of giving the Committee on Appropriations the right to present its bills and have them acted on when they are ready for consideration. That rule or necessity is stronger now than ever before. We now know as a matter of daily history that the House of Representatives intend to present to us in these bills the consideration of every branch of the public service, not only upon the basis of existing law, but upon the basis of the law as they propose to make it, so that every law which affects a salary or expenditure is to be brought before us for revision and action in the appropriation bills. That has greatly delayed the appropriation bills in the other House-we have a right to speak of it as a matter of history so that of the bills which are usually in the Senate long before the 1st of March, and certainly long before the 1st of April, only two or three have passed the House. They will pass the House at a later period of the session than usual. It is perfectly obvious that the Senate, if they intend to keep up with the public business and pass the appropriation bills without being hurried at the close of the session, must take them up as they are presented in their order, so as to allow the Committee on Appropriations to consider the bills as they come over and have them acted on here as rapidly as they are presented.

I shall therefore vote with the Committee on Appropriations to take up their bills as they are presented against anything that I know of that is pending. I concede the importance of this Mississippi resolution. I was in hopes that the gentlemen on the left of the House would at once agree to this investigation on the basis now stated by the Senator from Michigan, and I am only surprised that the resolu-tion was not pressed before. Indeed I think it ought to have been passed in the first week of the session. After three months have rolled around, there is no greater necessity for it to-day than there was the day before yesterday or at any time within the last ninety or one hundred days. Therefore it is not wise for us to interfere with an order of business that has been established by the vote of the Senate, that to me to make an immediate necessity of the Mississippi case when there has been no necessity for it the last ninety days is to crowd aside business that we must consider and ought to consider dispassionately. If the Senator from California who has charge of the bill chooses to give way to-day for the Mississippi resolution, I have nothing to say; but as long as he says to us that there is an importance in pressing that bill, I shall vote with him.

Mr. MORTON. I learn from the answer to the question asked by the Senator from Maine that there is no other appropriation bill in the Senate now from the House except the one that has already been presented. The House, as I am told, is engaged on the legislative appropriation bill, and the House is still on the first section of it. They have had, I believe, two or three days of general debate on the bill without regard to any specific provisions; but I am advised— I heard a member of the House say last week, in talking about it, that he believed the House would be a month on that bill, and from the character of the bill I should not be surprised. Therefore I think the character of the bill I should not be surprised. Therefore I think there can be no hurry for the consideration of the present diplomatic appropriation bill. I do not apprehend that this resolution will take any great length of time. I do not desire to speak myself, and if there is to be any debate I think it will be very brief. I should be glad to have a vote immediately, if possible. Therefore I think the resolution ought to be taken up, and the public service in connection with the appropriation bills cannot suffer thereby. There are particular reasons why the resolution should now be disposed of ticular reasons why the resolution should now be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 26. Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

call the roll.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. CONOVER] on this question. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay," on this motion.

Mr. WITHERS. My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] has been called home by sickness in his family. I understood from him before he left that he was paired on all questions arising under this resolution with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] If my colleague were here he would vote "nay" on this proposition, and I presume the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced-yeas 28, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Freling-huysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, and West—28.

West—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, English, Gordon, Howe, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, and Withers—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Conover, Cragin. Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florids, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, and Wright—14.

So the motion was not agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., announced that the President had, on the 27th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 386) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on as they are reached in the reading of the bill in their order, if there be no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, a very few words preliminary to acting upon the amendments may perhaps be proper.

The bill which I hold in my hand, as it passed the House of Representatives, appropriated $912,747.50. The Committee on Appropriresentatives, appropriated $912,747.30. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have reported it back, with amendments, so that the amount is $1,341,647.50. The amount of appropriations last year was $1,374,985. That is to say, the bill which we now report to the Senate makes appropriations less than those made last year by $33,337.50. These additions made by the Senate committee to the House bill are strictly in accordance with the service of last year. There is not an instance where we have increased a salary or created. There is not an instance where we have increased a salary or created an office. We have simply tried to preserve the integrity of the service for what we believe to be high public reasons. The reductions of $33,000 and over are from the causes which I will now state. Here-5.5,000 and as the bill was passed by the House, the amanuensis of Mr. Schenck has been allowed $2,500 on account of the minister's crippled arm. He being no longer minister, that item is not necessary for next year. The Mexican claims commission has closed its sary for next year. The Mexican claims commission has closed its business and the arbitrator has taken possession of it. That cost the present fiscal year $28,700. We eliminate that clause from the bill. Following the statute of last year authorizing the contract to be made, $5,000 was appropriated for a court-house and jail at Yedo, Japan. The contract has been made for a less sum, so that we are able to save in this bill $1,150. There is a reduction in the Spanish claims commission in contingencies, and especially by rent, of $3,088. The State Department is able to accommodate them in the new building, and thus save rent. One other item which makes up the amount is acknowledging the services of masters of vessels for the saving of life, $500. The cost for ten years past has been an average of $4,500. Five thousand dollars has been usually appropriated. It was thought that the average would not probably be exceeded, and it was safe therefore to make that reduction.

These are reductions of $35,438, and account for the difference between this bill as reported back by the Senate committee and the bill of last year. I suppose the Senate is familiar with the nature of the changes that have been made in the consular and diplomatic service, and it will not be necessary for me, certainly not in any preliminary remarks, to call especial attention to them, or at any rate to make any extended reference to them. I will give an instance or two illustrating the nature of the House bill with reference to the diplomatic service.

In 1856, twenty years ago, Congress fixed the salary of our ministers in Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia at $17,500, and that amount has been paid ever since. It perhaps was at the time somewhat of a reform, because the salary, the outfit, and the infit allowed to minof a reform, because the salary, the outher, and the line allowed to ministers, especially where they remained abroad but a year or two, made a greater amount than $17,500 a year. This amount was fixed and has been paid ever since, and is not too large. The bill which we received from the House cuts these ministers down to $14,000 each, which is too small. I will not discuss this particular provision unless some objection is made to restoring the salary to the amount fixed by the law in 1856, and as it has been ever since. the law in 1856, and as it has been ever since.

The same course is pursued with reference to the missions to Spain, Austria, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, &c. In the House bill there is a consolidation of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway under one minister, and $6,.00 only allowed for the service of the minister. The South American republics are consolidated into very few missions, eleven of them reduced to four, contrary to our interests, political and commercial, as is believed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Then the House passed through with the consular service. They leave out any of class 1 and class 2 in the bill by degrading those who are in class 1 down to class 3, and making a corresponding reduction down to the last class, where they eliminate consuls, leaving mere consular agents or entirely abolishing them.

In view of this action, in view of the features of the bill before us, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, the statement seems strange that the consular service is self-supporting, that it pays a revenue into the Treasury of a very large amount over and above expenses. It would seem from such a bill that this was a service in relieb there was a large deficiency and that it was a service in the consular service in the s above expenses. It would seem from such a bill that this was a service in which there was a large deficiency, and that it was necessary to cripple commerce, or take the risk of crippling commerce, in order to save the Treasury of the United States. The figures are that the total consular receipts for 1874-75 were $.37,938.49; the whole cost of the consular service was but $549,172.47; making an excess over cost of revenue into the Treasury above the expenses of $148,816.02.

Mr. SHERMAN. Are all expenses included $\frac{1}{2}$ Mr. SARGENT. The figures include everything of every nature, loss of exchange, salaries, and everything else. Commerce pays this loss of exchange, salaries, and everything else. Commerce pays this tax into the Treasury.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator state the amount again?

Mr. SARGENT. The amount over and above expenses is $148,816.02, nearly $150,000.

Mr. DORSEY. That is on the basis of the estimates of the Department?

Mr. SARGENT. That is the amount as shown by the Fifth Auditor's report of actual receipts and expenditures.

Mr. DORSEY. That is on the basis of the estimates made by the Department for the consular service this year?

Mr. SARGENT. No; these are the figures of the expenditures and receipts for 1874-75, the actual figures, not an estimate or a guess. The foreign commerce of the country is increasing in a most gratifying way; and certainly it is a bad time to begin to cut down the agencies by which that business is facilitated. I have no doubt that the receipts from the consular officers will be greatly increased the next fiscal year, provided the system is not crippled.

In 1870 the foreign commerce of the United States was $875,708,616.

In 1874 it was $1,265,719,964—an enormous increase in four years, nearly one-half. We are recovering from the effects of the war; our foreign commerce is becoming more adventurous and more successful, growing year by year, and counting by the hundred millions, under this very system. Now, are we to cripple it? Is it not well known that commerce will not seek a port where there is no representative of the Government of the United States? They are liable to all kinds

They will avoid a port from which you withdraw your consul.

However, I do not wish at this stage of the bill to be drawn into a discussion of details. I make these general statements in order that Senators may understand the nature of the reductions which were made in the House bill which was referred to us, and the nature of the additions which we have made by our amendments. In other words, we have not added one dollar to this bill that has not hereto-fore been appropriated and wisely expended. I think I may say, and it will be admitted by Senators on both sides of this Chamber-it has never been questioned anywhere - that the foreign department of the Government, the State Department, is as economically and carefully administered as it is possible to be. It is frequently the case, where there has been an appropriation of money the expenditure of which was vested in the discretion of the Secretary of State, that a considerable balance of the amount has been returned back into the Treasury. I have watched this for several years, and during the examination of this bill I have had occasion to observe how accurate were the impressions which I had in reference to that matter; and I am more and more convinced that the Secretary of State administers the funds under his charge carefully, exactly, and with economy.

I ask that the amendments be acted upon as we proceed with the

Mr. WITHERS. Before we proceed to the consideration of this consular and diplomatic bill by sections, I have a word or two to say of a general character in connection with the bill, being a member of the committee which reported it.

The bill reported by the committee is framed upon the basis of an opinion that no further reductions in the appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service are practicable with a due regard to the interests of the country and the public service. I cannot agree in full to that opinion. I believe that the imperative necessity for reform in all departments of the public service is upon us, growing out of the present depressed financial condition of our country. I believe that if there is any one sentiment which more than another predominates in the public mind, it is the demand for greater economy in our public service, the demand that the great expenditures upon which our public service has been conducted for some years past shall be cur-tailed wherever it can be done with a proper regard for the interests of the service.

I agree fully and sympathize entirely with that feeling. I am not, however, prepared to say that the bill as passed by the lower House may not have gone too far in the direction of economy, that they may not have applied the pruning-knife too freely, especially to this consular and diplomatic service; and therefore in many respects I am prepared and shall cheerfully vote for amendments increasing the appropriations made by the House for these purposes; but in other respects I think the bill as reported is objectionable. I believe in some instances the salaries therein provided may properly be reduced, and without any detriment to the public service. I believe that in some instances consulates may be abolished without in any degree impairing our public service. Thus believing, I shall vote upon the amendments as they are proposed by the committee in consonance with my own convictions of public duty and propriety. I have thought sary, being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to make this general explanation of my position before we come to consider the bill by sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill, and the first amendment will be stated as it is reached in the reading.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in line 10 to strike out the words "14,000" and insert "17,500," and in line 11 to strike out "56" and insert "70;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, at $17,500 each, $70,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator [Mr. SARGENT] who has charge of this bill a question. Did the committee, in considering the reduction of salaries proposed by the House to our ministers to England, France, Russia, and Germany, take in consideration the relative difference in the cost of living at these respective courts? They were reduced from $17,500 to $14,000 a year by the House of Representatives, and the Senate is asked by the committee to non-concur in this reduction.

In former times the salaries were graduated by the difference in the cost of living at the respective capitals. The cost lier courts demanded the higher salaries. That standard of graduating salaries to our foreign ministers seemed just then, and I think it is just now. We know that the expenses of living in London used to be a third more than they were in Germany. If this be true, why should the salary be the

we know, too—at least I have been so informed—that the expenses of living in Russia used to be much less than in France. Why, if this be true, should the salaries be the same? It occurs to me that this practice in the early history of the Government, which continued I believe as late as 1849—'50, and perhaps even still later, of graduating these salaries to our foreign ministers by the cost of living at the respective courts to which they were accredited, was an equitable one. It is the only just standard of approximating justice in fixing the rate of compensation to our foreign embassadors. Those that are required to pay most should receive most.

the rate of compensation to our foreign embassadors. Those that are required to pay most should receive most.

In many of the provinces of continental Europe the expenses of living used to be greatly less, I might safely say a third if not a half, than the cost of living in London. I should like to hear from the committee why, if this difference in the relative expense of living in England and France as compared with Russia and Germany still exists, the salaries at those four courts are put at the same sum. If $17,500 is given to our minister in London, (where, I admit, the expenses are very heavy, and have been possibly increased within the last few years,) why should not the salary of our minister to Germany be reduced, since the expenses of living at the latter court are greatly less than those in London or in Paris?

It would appear that the committee, in fixing the salaries at London greatly less than those in London or in Faris?

It would appear that the committee, in fixing the salaries at London, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg at $17,500 per annum to each, had entirely ignored the difference in living at these respective courts.
Formerly the ministers to Berlin and St. Petersburg received greatly less than the envoys to London and Paris.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee took some pains to inform themselves in reference to that proposition. Of course it would be a sufficient answer for us to say we simply take the service as we find it; but I thought it was better to go beyond that, and, if possible, to give any reasons which would be just defending the service. House-rent any reasons which would be just defending the service. House-rent in St. Petersburg costs 8,000 rubles for an ordinary modest house, such as is occupied by our representative, which I believe is about $3,000. That takes one-third of the salary here given. A thousand pounds was paid by Mr. Schenck in London for his house-rent—$5,000 for a modpaid by Mr. Schenck in London for his house-rent—$5,000 for a modest, moderate sort of house, but such a one as he could afford to occupy; not too extravagant, and yet required. We are informed that St. Petersburg is one of the most expensive of foreign capitals, and I have no doubt that it is true. Certainly Germany is as costly as France; there can be no doubt of that. It has been so within the last few years. Since the empire has grown to such an extent, and since it has levied tribute on France, the vast amount of money expended there has brought expensive habits among the people which perhaps will never be corrected. At any rate, these expensive habits exist now, and Berlin is much more expensive, we are told, than either London or Paris. But Great Britain and France in 1856 were put together and two years thereafter Russia was added, and subsequently together, and two years thereafter Russia was added, and subsequently Germany was added. In adding Germany to this corps they abolcernany was added. In adding Germany to this corps they abolished a number of other ministers, which were consolidated in the mission to the German Empire, so that probably there was a saving on the old salaries by putting Germany in the list of first-class missions. If the question were asked whether these salaries of $17,500 were extravagant, considering the cost of the cheapest of these missions, I think it would have to be insisted that the salaries are not too large; that they are really too small retain the too long. They are that that they are really too small rather than too large. They are very much less than any other nations pay, even nations much poorer than we are, with a larger debt, and with much less resources. we are, with a larger debt, and with much less resources. I do not see myself how any man can live, even respectably, upon the salary which we pay at either of these four courts. It certainly would be impossible for him to save any money. But as this is the amount which has been allowed for years, it looks like requiring that the diplomatic service in important posts shall be filled only by rich men for us to reduce the amount of salary which we pay them to such a figure that they must either appear meanly there or draw upon their own recoverse in order to write it the salary which we have the salary when the salary when the salary when the salary when the salary which we have the salary which we have a salary when the salary which we have a salary which we have a salary when the salary which we have a salary when the salary which we have a sa resources in order to maintain themselves in some respectable degree.

Mr. DAVIS. The first amendment involves the principle of the bill. The bill came to us reducing the salaries of our ministers at these four great powers, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, to $14,000 instead of $17,500, as it has been heretofore. That will in a measure fix the principle on which the bill came to the Senate and which your committee has changed by this first amendment, and the same principle runs all through it. The salaries, charges, and compensation of the parties named in it have been by the House reduced in the aggregate by about half a million dellars. It him, I no other world Mr. DAVIS. The first amendment involves the principle of the the aggregate by about half a million dollars, I think. In other words, the total was $912,750, as reported from the House, and now it is $1,341,000, making a difference of about half a million of dollars' increase by the committee of the Senate.

I am disposed to think that the House in some instances got the salaries below what a proper economical management of the Government would require. I believe in some instances they are too low, and that there ought to be an advance upon the House bill. I also believe that the Senate Committee has made advances where they ought not to have occurred. I think there is force in what the Senator from Kentucky has said, that the expenses of living in Great Britain and France are greater than in Germany and Russia. that view I move—I believe it to be in order—to strike out "Germany and Russia" from this clause, in order at the proper time to move that the solaries of the minutes to the clause. move that the salaries of the ministers to those two countries be made $15,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the committee's amendment. The Senator will have an opportunity of striking out afterward any part of this clause.

Mr. DAVIS. If we adopt the committee's amendment of $17,500, will there be any power to change it afterward? My object is to have a vote to know whether the Senate desires to make the salaries of the ministers to Germany and Russia the same as those to Great Britain and France. I will take the suggestion of the Chair and seek to accomplish the object in any way he may suggest; but I prefer having that test made before we act upon the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unbroken practice of the Senate is to consider first the amendments reported by the committee having charge of the bill. This amendment of the committee does not touch the question raised by the Senator from West Virginia. The Senator can move an amendment transferring any part of the item, after the amendments of the committee have been acted on, as his proposition does not touch the amendment of the committee but the text of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand it, the committee's amendment now is that the salaries of the ministers to these four powers shall be $17,500. The amendment of the committee would certainly have to be changed in some way to reach the objects I desire if the Senate agree with me in making the salary of the German and Russian missions $15,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate now, if there be no objection. The Senator from West Virginia will state his amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us vote on the committee's amendment. That wili be a test question. If that be voted down, we can alter the paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no choice as to the manner it is reached. The Senator having charge of the bill, I understand, prefers that the vote be taken on the committee's amendment first.

Mr SARGENT. Let that be taken first. All those who want to Mr SARGENI. Let that be taken list. All those who want to modify any part of the paragraph can vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The text can be changed at any time after the amendent of the committee is acted on.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the vote is taken I will inquire as to the right to offer amendments to the bill as reported by the committee. After we shall have proceeded to act upon all the amendments of the committee, will it then be in order to move an amendment to any of those amendments which have been perfected by adopting them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be.
Mr. WITHERS. That is all I want to know.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will understand that if his proposition is to touch the text untouched by the amendments of the committee, he will have a right to offer it; but to reach the amendments of the committee the Senate will have the opportunity on the question of concurrence in the Senate. Then any Senator can move to modify them as he pleases.

Mr. WITHERS. That was precisely the point of my inquiry as whether or not we have the right to move amendments to such amendments of the committee as shall have been adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be open to modification in the Senate on the question of concurrence.

Mr. SARGENT. I concur entirely with the Senator from West Virginia that the amendment of the committee now pending is really a test one and illustrates the principle of the bill; and in order that it may be distinctly taken I ask for the yeas and nays on adopting the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that if this amendment should be agreed to in Committee of the Whole, when the bill is reported to the Senate the question will be on concurring in the amendments of the committee, at which time the Senator from Virginia or any other Senator can move to modify it as he may see fit. Then the question will be taken first on the modification, and then on the amendment as modified.

Mr. DAVIS. And we can modify any portion of the amendments adopted in committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They can be modified by the Sen-

Mr. WITHERS. But the passage of the amendment precludes any further amendment in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, because it is conclusive there; but when it is reported to the Senate it is in a different stage.

Mr. McDONALD. Do I understand that the Senate is now acting on the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations to the House

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the first amendment.
Mr. McDONALD. Striking out "$14,000" and inserting "$17,500?"
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.
Mr. McDONALD. I understood the Senator from California to ask for the yeas and nays on that. Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are called for on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 32, nays 17; as follows:

32, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christianey, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Speneer, and Windom—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Davis, Eaton, English, Gordon, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Mitchell, Patterson, Randolph, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, Vest, and Wright—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 13, to insert after the word "Austria" the word "Italy;" so as to read:

For salarles of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Spain, Austria, Italy, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, &c.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Why is this restored?

Mr. SARGENT. The bill as it comes from the House tears the service all to pieces. The reason we put Italy in this paragraph is because it is a mission of considerable importance. We simply restore cause it is a mission of considerable importance. We simply restore the service as it has been heretofore for years, believing that it is for the public interest. We understand by the rules of the Senate that we are to report appropriation bills according to the existing law. That is of itself a sufficient reason, and that is the general reason which applies all the way through, and specifically in this case. There is no showing why Italy should not be put in as well as Brazil, or Mexico, or Spain, or Austria. We have as large a commerce with it; we have as important political relations with it. For that reason we restored it. We have not created an office or created a salary, or displaced it from the service.

displaced it from the service.

Mr. Morris, the government of Italy
Mr. Morris, the government of Italy at the present time comprehends about as large a population as that of Great Britain, and it also comprehends the place where the Roman Catholic religion finds its head-center. It is of great political sig-Catholic religion finds its head-center. It is of great political significance, therefore, that our country should be represented at that court; and this Government now includes within it the former governments of Naples and Sardinia. Only a few years since we had missions at Sardinia and at Naples and at Rome, the whole cost of which was $22,500. All these are now condensed into one mission, costing $12,000 annually for the last few years. I hope that we shall not degrade this mission below what it has been since the accession to represent Victor Empayore.

power of Victor Emmanuel.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am surprised to see the vote on the last amendment. It does seem to me that if Senators will look at this matter in a dispassionate way, and not in any party aspect, the idea of reducing the salaries of our leading ministers below what they were twenty years ago is so totally unjustifiable that we ought not to divide about it. The salaries of these ministers was fixed by what is known as the Pennington act of 1856. Twenty years ago that act was passed by the unanimous vote of both Houses, the Senate being democratic and the House being republican. The salaries were fixed then in gold, when everything was based upon gold. It was called the diplomatic bill, and is so known in the ordinary phraseblogy of the Department of State. It was passed, after the fullest consideration, with entire unanimity. That is the law of the land. It has stood there for twenty years, and nobody has ever proposed to change it.

I am disposed to go as far toward economy as any member of this body, I think; and, if we have advanced during the war or since the war the salary of any of our civil or military or naval employés beyond what is reasonable, I am willing, without regard to circumstance or time or persons or place, to reduce it; but we ought not, when we or time or persons or place, to reduce it; but we ought not, when we are endeavoring to accomplish a real good, (to promote economy in the service of the Government,) to strike at all branches of the Government by some arbitrary rule, without regarding the circumstances which led to fixing the salaries. I say to Senators now that these salaries were fixed twenty years ago, without the slightest controversy, without the slightest dispute, upon a lower basis than those of the diplomatic service of any leading nation of the world. While the minister of Great Britain to the United States gets, according to the newspapers and the Blue-Book of England, somewhere between $25,000 newspapers and the Blue-Book of England, somewhere between $25,000 and $30,000 a year, we pay our minister to live in London, a much more expensive place to live in than Washington, only $17,500.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that my vote will be controlled by his answer to a question which I wish to put.

I understood him to say that the salary had not been increased for twenty years; that it stands as it did twenty years ago. Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say that what I stated was literally true of the missions to Great Britain and France, but when Germany advanced to a great power and became an empire, absorbing several countries to which we had several missions, we put Germany on a footing with France and Great Britain. We saved money by that enlargement. Then Russia had been a warm friend of this country at every stage of its history; and when we were fixing the relations with this great power, we placed Russia, a country with seventy millions of people, on the same footing with the other empires of the

Mr. MAXEY. So that, as this bill is reported, the salary of the minister to the Germanic confederacy is not larger than that of the minister to England or France?

Mr. SHERMAN. The same. The Italian mission is what this amendment involves. That is the last portion of the world on which anybody ought to promote economy or to make a point. I remember very well that Italy was placed among the second-class missions shortly after the battles of Magenta and Solferino, which established Italy as a secondary power. It was on the motion of Mr. Burlingame, after those victories of Victor Emmanuel and the French against Ausafter those victories of Victor Emmanuel and the French against Austria, when Italy became a power in the world, that Italy was, by a unanimous vote and by a general hearty, joyous feeling, placed in the class of secondary missions at $12,000 a year. That was in 1860, if I remember right, before the occupation of Reme but after the battles of Magenta and Solferino, by which Victor Emmanuel's dominions were extended. There it stands. Since Italy was placed on the secondary roll, it has advanced several grades really in power. Since that time it has occupied Rome, and now Italy is a great country of the Mediterranean—next to France the greatest country of the Mediterranean. iterranean-next to France the greatest country of the Mediterranean. It is a country with which our people have more intimate relations than almost any other country in Europe. Our American citizens go to Rome to study art and literature, and we have a good deal of commerce with Italy. Many commercial ports of importance are in Italy. We have quite a number of consuls there. It is now a great power. Why it should be stricken out of this bill when it has already advanced beyond the grade it was when the salary was fixed and when it was not so important a power as now, I do not know. Why it is stricken out of the list of second-class powers and put on a list by its ricken out of the list of second-class powers and put on a list by its stricken out of the list of second-class powers and put on a list by it-self, I cannot see. There is no sense in that, it appears to me. It seems to me, dealing with this bill, that we ought not to change the law in bills like this. Certainly we ought not to change the law unless there is some reason for doing so, because there is less abuse in the diplomatic and consular service of our Government than in other branches of the Government. There never has been any abuse in the diplomatic and consular relations of the Government. That service has been conducted in the main with great ability and with great economy, and therefore it is idle to strike at these salaries unless there is some good reason for doing so. If Senators would go into the cities where these men have to live, and consider the peculiar re-lations which surround them, the difficulties that surround them, the habits and customs that form part of the expense, and the necessary expense, of a minister of the United States to one of these countries, they would see that it is not wise economy to reduce these salaries.

I shall therefore vote with the Committee on Appropriations in restoring this bill to what the law requires; and I say neither House has a right to force the other House to consent to a change of existing law. Each House should freely consent to a change of the law before it is made. When the House of Representatives sends these appropriation bills to us proposing to radically change the whole service of the Government, it has no right to ask us to adopt those changes unless we see that there is good reason for changing the law.

Mr. MAXEY. Does the amendment of the committee correct the appropriations so as to conform to the law as it stands?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I think, therefore, that we ought not to divide into political parties on this question because the democratic party happen to have a majority in the House. The very diplomatic bill to which I have referred was framed by a Congress in the midst of high party excitement, when the Senate was three-fourths democratic, and the Honse of Representatives had a decided republican majority, and when party heats were at the highest, in 1856, in the midst of a presidential canvass; and yet no question was raised be-tween the two Houses as to the salaries, and if I remember aright, the bill was passed by a unanimous vote. It was framed in the House of Representatives, passed there, and sent to the Senate, and finally passed both Houses, called the Pennington bill.

It seems to me that we ought simply to restore the service to what the law is, to what the law demands. If, then, our Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House concur in any reasonable decrease in expenditures, let it be proposed and let us adopt it; or if there is a change of circumstances or some fact which leads us to believe that a minister who is provided for by law should be dispensed with, or a consulabolished, it is very proper for us to adopt that amendment; but we should not go to work in an appropriation bill and refuse to appropriate money to carry into execution the law. Look at this case. Some Senators refuse to concur in this amendment. If the Senate had not adopted this amendment already voted upon, the salaries of these ministers would have gone on, and they would have been entitled to the money, because the law says their salary shall be so much; but you have appropriated a less amount. That gives them a legal right to go before the Court of Claims and demand more money, because the law provides, that a minister shall have $17,500, and the appropriation bill only gives him $14,000.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator will notice that there is provision for

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told that is arranged; but at any rate there is no reason for such action in this bill. There is reason sometimes for changing our salaries, which have been fixed some years ago, be-cause there is a change of circumstances. Money is worth more at different times; but in Europe it is different; gold is less valuable now than it was twenty years ago in every city in Europe; and therefore a salary of $17,500 is less than a salary of $17,500 twenty years

Is there anything in the power or ability of this Government that calls for this? On the contrary, the United States since this law was passed has nearly doubled in population, more than doubled in wealth, vastly increased in power and strength, and in every other Therefore there is no argument, it seems to me, in favor of these reductions, except a hap-hazard, blind strike in appropriation bills; and it seems to me we can only yield to that so far as the public interest demands.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not know that I should have risen to say anything but for the last remark that fell from the Senator from Ohio. I was one of those who voted against the previous amendment of the committee on the ground, as I stated to the Senate, that I believed the Russian and German missions were not so expensive as those to Great Britain and France, and with a view at the proper time of moving a proposition to separate them. But the Senator from Ohio says there is no reason for these reductions except mere blind party policy striking hap-hazard. He certainly does not believe that. He does not mean that Senators only vote because of party zeal at blind hap-hazard. I think that is rather an extravagant assertion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said we ought not to do it. We ought not to

Mr. SHERMAN. I said we ought not be make this reduction in this hap-hazard way.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I agree with the Senator, but I understood him Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator knows are that the senator knows are the senator knows. to say that he knew of no reason except that. If the Senator knows no other reason, some of the rest of us who happened to vote that way believe we know a reason.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, we are acting upon a bill sent to us from the House of Representatives which underwent a very thorough examination in that body, and on the final vote was passed by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I certainly do not wish to call my friend from Indiana to order; but I must call somebody to order in the constant habit we are falling into of relying upon the proceedings of the House of Representatives to influence our votes. all have done, but on the next gentleman I shall make it.

Mr. McDONALD. I am only following a bad example.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is well taken. It is not in order to refer to the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not hear the point of order of the Sena-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order raised was that it was not proper for a Senator to refer to the proceedings of the House of Representatives for the purpose of influencing the votes of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. On that subject I desire to make a remark. Have I not a right to comment on this bill which comes from the House of Representatives? Am I precluded from referring to a bill which comes to me for my action? Can I not read it, and can I not show what the House has done in which I am asked to concur? Do I understand the Chair to rule that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let us understand one another before we go any further on this question. If it is not pertinent for a Senator to comment upon a House bill on which the Senate is called upon to act, I think the great right of discussion is taken away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator misunderstood the Chair if he understood the Chair to decide in that way.

Mr. STEVENSON. I only want to know whether I can comment upon a bill which comes from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I cannot do that without referring to what the House has done in that bill. If that is out of order, then one of the great rights of free discussion, it seems to me, is taken from Senators

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I had said about all I had to say in reference to the action of the House on this bill; that is, that it had come to us from the House of Representatives after having been duly considered there, and passed, as I understood, by almost a unanimous

Sir, I have not yet heard in anything that has been said by members of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, who have charge of this bill, nor from any other member any reasons to satisfy me that the House was in error in regulating these salaries and making the appropriation as it has done in this bill. Until I am so satisfied, Senators may be surprised at the votes I shall give, but I shall continue to vote against the amendments.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment already acted upon, and in view of what has been said in reference to the vote of the minority on this question, I wish to say that I am very sure I desire to do nothing that will in any way impede the public service, or the public convenience, or the public good. Ever since the beginning of the Government I believe the practice has prevailed that the House of Representatives originates the general appropriation bills, and  $\Gamma$  take it that practice goes upon the ground that as they alone can provide for raising revenue in the first instance, they are better acquainted with the amount of money we have to expend for any purpose than the Senate. Whatever may be the reason, however, this has been the practice. I take it that my vote and action are based on that fact, that the House of Representatives are well informed as to what appropriations the Government is able to make, what amount of money we have to expend. I take it they are, like we are, patriotic, and desire to do their duty, and that they do not move in a matter of so much moment to the Government as this without having familiarized themselves with all the facts necessary for a reasonable and correct judgment. When, therefore, after long deliberation, they have come to a solemn judgment upon this matter and sent their action to this House, unless I can be satisfied that they have acted through inadvertence, that they were not properly informed, that they were deceived or misled by some consideration, I shall always whether the House be controlled by one political party or another, be inclined to follow the action of the House of Representatives. Under the Constitution all bills for raising revenue must originate in that House. We here in the Senate may amend those bills, but we cannot originate a bill to raise revenue. amend those bills, and I suppose that power is vested in the Senate with a view to cure any inadvertent misapprehension or misinformation which may have prevailed in the House, and a like practice it seems to me has prevailed in reference to the general appropriation bills. If I can be satisfied that the House committee were not well informed, that they did not know what they were about, that some material fact which they ought to have considered in connection with the salaries of our ministers to Great Britain, France, Germany and Russia was omitted, and that they have erred, then I am willing to join the Senate in correcting that error and exercising appropriate and reasonable power in that respect. But what I am called upon now to do is to offer the House an indignity, by saying that their committee did not know what they were about; that they were misinformed; and that they were not capable of understanding the subject thus committed to them; and that the whole House of Representatives of the American people, en masse, did not know what they were about when they passed this bill. I cannot do it. If Senators desire to change my vote on this question or any other in reference to a general appropriation bill, they have got to assign some reason going to show the inadvertence or the misinformation of the House going to show the inadvertence or the misinformation of the House touching that matter.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana and of the Senate, as a point of order was raised, the Chair will direct the Clerk to read from the Manual the authority on this subject

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] a few moments ago asked the question whether he was not at liberty to comment upon a House bill. Certainly he has that right; but I understood the question to go to this point: whether it is proper to argue that the House has fully considered a thing, understand it well, and that we ought to accept the conclusion of the House for that reason. I cannot agree with my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] in his argument. We will presume that the House has done its duty; that it has considered this bill according to the best intelligence it has, and it is our duty to consider it in the same way, not to presume anything or concede anything because we suppose the House understood it, and therefore take it upon their judgment. The Constitution requires an appropriation bill to pass this body. What for? That we may give our opinion upon it as well as the House. It may be proper for it to originate in the House, but it comes here for the express purpose of being considered, and it is not our duty and we have no business to adopt it simply because the House has passed it. If that argument is to be used, you might as well abolish this body, and have but one House.

I simply rose, Mr. President, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Seuate to the principle involved in this particular amendment. In lines 12 and 13, in providing salaries for our ministers to Spain, Aus-In lines 12 and 13, in providing salaries for our ministers to Spain, Austria, Brazil, Mexico, &c., Italy is dropped out of the House bill. It was before placed by the law in that class. Then in lines 16 and 17 an appropriation is made for Italy of $8,000. The substance of the two taken together is that the salary of the minister to Italy is reduced from $12,000 to $8,000, and in the concluding part of this bill it is declared that the salaries fixed by the appropriation sections shall be becaused the salaries of these ministers and conselled a genbe hereafter the annual salaries of those ministers and consuls—a general provision to that effect.

Now I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the vicious character of this legislation, and to give my opinion that it reverses the whole theory upon which the business of Congress is conducted. The two Houses are divided up into committees. It has been found in parliamentary history from the first organization of parliaments, that the business was best conducted by appointing a particular committee to consider a particular subject, and we have adopted standing committees. That was not the case in the first organization of Congress, but for many years we have had standing committees. For example, we have had a Committee on Foreign Relations. All business of that kind goes to that committee. In time it becomes much more familiar with subjects of that kind than the rest of the Senate for the reason that it is called upon to consider questions of that character, and naturally becomes better informed upon them. So with regard to the Committee on Commerce; commercial questions go to that committee, and members for years are considering questions of that character because they belong to that committee. So with regard to the judi-ciary; all questions in regard to the courts go to that committee. They become more familiar with the organization of courts and with our judicial system, and can give a better opinion upon questions of that kind than can a committee whose attention has been devoted to subjects generally or given to some other. This is the general prin-ciple upon which our committees are organized and the business of Congress conducted.

In the first place, should there be a mission in Italy at all? Should we have a minister there? That was a question for Congress. It came before Congress in a bill. That bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House and was considered. It was decided that we should have a minister to the court of Italy and that decided that we should have a minister to the court of Italy and that he should have a certain grade. Congress upon deliberation determined not only that we should have such a mission, but the character of it, the grade of it, the dignity of it. The Committee on Foreign Relations, for the sake of illustration, having its attention frequently called to such subjects, perhaps is better calculated to judge than any other committee in this body what should be the grade of a mission to a particular court—at the court of St. James, in France, in Italy, in Austria—or whether we should have a mission at all to those courts. So with regard to the judiciary; whether we should have two district courts in the State of Ohio or only one—for the consideration of that question the Judiciary Committee is better informed than any other committee in this body; because they are frequently called upon to pass upon such questions.

Now, when an appropriation committee assumes to pass upon the question whether we should have a mission at the court of Victor Emmanuel or not, or whether it shall be a first-class, second-class, or third-class mission—when an appropriation committee assumes to consider that original question, it arrogates to itself functions that do not belong to it and is in violation of the whole theory of the business of Congress. No one committee can consider all these questions intelligently. The Appropriation Committee of this body, I do not intelligently. The Appropriation Committee of this body, I do not care how able it is or how well informed, cannot undertake to pass upon the whole character of the public service in diplomatic relations, in interior relations, whatever we may have to do; and that is what this committee has assumed to do in the other House. It has arrogated to itself the determination of questions pertaining to every department of this Government. I understand the business of an appropriation committee to be this: Congress first provides by law to create a mission, provides for expenditures of various kinds, sala ries of domestic officers, of foreign ministers, of secretaries, and all that; and when we have determined by law what shall be created and what shall not, then the business of the Appropriation Committee is to appropriate money to meet the demands of the law, not to undertake to determine the whole question. That is enough business for such a committee, either in the House or in the Senate—fully as much as it can discharge intelligently. When it undertakes to determine whether we shall have a mission to the court of Victor Emmanuel and what his grade shall be, whether we shall have a consul at Havre or at Lyons, whether we shall have a minister or only a consul-general in Japan, that committee draws to itself the whole ss of Congress, and to discharge it intelligently it ought to have as much capacity as all the other committees put together, because all the rest of them put together sometimes fail. It is simply preposterous, Mr. President. An appropriation committee, however able, however intelligent, and however patriotic, has not got the time to however intelligent, and however patriotic, has not got the time to consider all these questions.

Suppose it is proposed to abolish a consulship in Japan, if you please. The Appropriation Committee simply strikes out the salary. Ordinarily that question ought to go to the Committee on Commerce. They have been acquainted with commercial subjects, have been considering the commerce with Japan for many years. It has been their special business, and they can pass upon that question more intelligently than any committee on appropriations; and yet this Committee on Appropriations of the House has taken from the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Foreign Affairs and tee on Commerce and the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on the Judiciary all these questions and assumed to determine them for itself. When we get the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which we shall have here in a few weeks, we may find out that they have determined to strike out certain courts by reducing the salaries of the judges, and thus assumed to exercise the peculiar functions of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I think the safest plan is to let the Committee on Appropriations confine itself to making those appropriations which the law requires. Whether salaries shall be reduced or whether certain offices shall be abolished should be left to be considered by those committees to which those subjects appropriately belong. Whenever one committee in this body or in the other House arrogates to itself the whole business of Congress, you will have loose and bad legislation, and they must necessarily legislate about what they do not half understand, and what they cannot understand, and what there is a great deal of presumption in their presuming to understand.

I have here the act creating this mission to Italy. I want to show that it was a distinct act, considered by Congress entirely aside from the question of appropriations. It was passed June 16, 1860:

Embassadors, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, agents, and secretaries and second secretaries of legation shall be entitled to salaries as hereinafter provided.

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to France, Germany, Great Britain, and Russia, $17,500 each; to Austria, Brazil, China, Italy, Japan, Mexico, and Spain, $12,000 each; to Chili and Peru, $10,000 each.

That was the subject of separate consideration by Congress; but a committee on appropriations now takes the whole thing into its keeping and consideration, determines to strike down this mission keeping and consideration, determines to strike down this mission altogether and reduce that one, and change the grade.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the date of that act?

Mr. MORTON. June 16, 1860.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator give the page?

Mr. MORTON. I have lost it myself. I simply refer to that to show that this question of what the salaries should be ought to be a subject of separate legislation. If it is proposed to abolish the mission to Italy altogether, that should come before the Senate and be referred to the proper committee, that that committee may consider it: and when it has been considered, then they can report their acit; and when it has been considered, then they can report their ac-tion to the Senate. But for an appropriation committee to assume to itself the jurisdiction in that case and in every other is virtually taking upon itself the whole legislation of Congress; it is in violation of the theory upon which we do business, and we ought to give no countenance to it. Let the committee stick to its duty and be if the law is not right, then let the consideration of changes in the law be referred to the appropriate committee having charge of that subject, and let it be considered intelligently.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a ques-

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERS. I concur in a good deal that has been said by the Senator as to the assumption of powers by the Appropriation Committee; but it seems to me he would restrict them unduly in the As I understood him, he would restrict the Approother direction. As I inderstood him, he would restrict the Appropriation Committee solely and exclusively to voting such appropriations as the law prescribes for certain officers. If that be so, I do not see what is the use of the Appropriation Committee at all. If they are compelled to report simply an appropriation as the law provides for certain officials, I see no necessity for an Appropriation Commit-

Mr. MORTON. It has been thought better in a representative Government like ours that there shall not be continual appropriations, and that appropriations for fixed subjects, and for that amount which is determined, shall be made from year to year. We have departed from it in two things. We have departed from it especially in regard to the payment of interest on our public debt; but, so far as all other appropriations are concerned, they are required to be made from year to year. Our safety as a free people perhaps consists in that.

Mr. WITHERS. But I would respectfully submit to the Senator whether his construction of the duties of an appropriation committee is not virtually making the appropriations from year to year. If they are restricted rigidly simply to an appropriation of certain moneys as provided by law, it seems to me it is a perpetuation of the ex-ising appropriations.

Mr. MORTON. I will state what I understand to be the function of an appropriation committee. It is their business to find out what the law requires or authorizes to be paid in a single case. some cases where there is no fixed amount; for example, an appropriation for a public work. That is a question of judgment. That comes under another principle; and I think even in that case all such instances ought to be in some form considered by the appropriate

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It always is.

Mr. MORTON. The laws are changed and sometimes it is a matter Mr. MORTON. The laws are changed and sometimes it is a matter of construction, and requires learning and ability to know what the law does require in a given case. If the law is not right, what I say is that the Appropriation Committee should not assume to determine that question. It may, if it chooses, present the matter to Congress and let that go before the proper committee and let it be determined in the right way. I think it is daugerous for one committee to arrogate to itself the determination of the character of the whole service. They cannot perform it well and wisely. I do not care how good their purposes are, one set of men cannot consider it fully.

Mr. WITHERS. I concur fully in that view of the Senator from Indiana, and I would say here that I deprecate as much as he or any

Indiana, and I would say here that I deprecate as much as he or any other Senator can the practice which has arisen in the legislation of Congress of legislating in appropriation bills; but I believe that the power which did not stop at ingrafting upon an appropriation bill a civil-rights bill ought not to rise up in holy horror at the suggestion of an abrogation of an office.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not concur in some of the positions assumed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] and I am sorry to differ, too, with my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] I think the Appropriation Committees are the selected organs of either House of Congress to inquire into the legitimate expenditures of the Government in every department, and to recommend all proper appropriations required by each and all its agencies for the proper execution of its duties during each and every fiscal year. The duty of recommending appropriations carries with it an inquiry into the mode and manner of the service to be provided for in all its ramified forms. I think upon no other committee can this duty be imposed as upon the Committee on Appropriations. If they ascertain that an office is a sinceure, or that the compensation allowed is greatly above or below the service rendered by the incumbent, they should recommend an increase or decrease, as the case may be. If Congress concurs in the recommendation, then modify your existing law in such manner as to harmonize with the appropriation. What objection is there to this mode of legislation? How can any committee of appropriations properly discharge its duty without inquiring into the character and value of the service, whether beneficial or otherwise? If the service value of the service, whether beneficial or otherwise? If the service can be dispensed with, then to recommend no appropriation, but ask its immediate abolition. If the only duty of a committee of appropriations be to recommend the various amounts fixed by law as salaries, then the committee ought to be abolished. That seemed to be the argument of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

The Senator from Obio [Mr. SHERMAN] need have no alarm that, if the reductions of salaries proposed by the House bill are adopted, the proper legislation reducing the salaries to the proposed reductions will not be carried out. That Senator seemed to be amazed that any of the Senators upon this side of the Chamber voted to concur in the House bill reducing the salaries of the missions to France, Great of the Senators upon this side of the Chamber voted to concur in the House bill reducing the salaries of the missions to France, Great Britain, Germany, and Russia. Now, Mr. President, (I am one who voted for the reduction proposed by the House bill,) I disclaim, sir, all party bias in that vote; for I do not hesitate to say, here and now, that there never was a time in the past history of this Government when stern economy was demanded by both parties in every Department of this Government than at this present hour. Our constituency demand it of us all, and that demand is not confined to party. I see and read in leading republican usages in the Northwest demands I see and read in leading republican papers in the Northwest demands for retrenchment and economy in our public expenditures as I do in democratic papers. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that without economy we must expect empty coffers. I see it stated in a New York paper that there were seven thousand seven hundred commercial failures during the past year; a heavy increase over former years, and they still continue.

The commercial disaster and extreme monetary depression demand of the American Congress in this hour of popular need the most rigid economy in every species of expenditure where the public service will justify it. Everywhere the evidences of the public monetary distress are seen, and bankruptcies are multiplying daily.

I hesitate not to say, in a spirit of patriotism rather than of party, that I should rejoice to see the expenditures of this Government reduced during the next fiscal year $30,000,000. If Senators on the other side persuade themselves that this sentiment emanates from any desire for mere party triumph, they are greatly in error. I would not knowingly make any reduction at the expense of any branch of the public service. But I believe the proposed reduction can be made without injury to our foreign service. When Senators go home they will readily realize the delusion that this demand for rigid economy, as wall as public hometry is confined available to any our return.

as well as public honesty, is confined exclusively to any party.

I am not disposed to be niggardly in salaries to our official employés, at home or abroad; but I shall earnestly strive for a moderate reduction in all our expenditures where the public service will justify reduction in all our expenditures where the public service will justify such reduction. You have reduced the salary of the President of the United States one-half. Why was it done, except upon the ground of stern public necessity? You pay your Cabinet ministers in Washington in a depreciated currency $5,000 a year. We know the claims on their hospitality, we realize the great expense of living in this great national metropolis. Why give to your minister at London over $20,000? The salary is $17,500 in gold. He is then paid in preparing for his return and for the period engaged in returning an additional sum which I have seen put at $2,800 in gold, making, in all, $20,300. sum which I have seen put at $2,800 in gold, making, in all, $20,300. Besides this a large amount is allowed the embassador for contingent expenses, which I saw put down for one year at London at over $16,000. We have also a consul at London and a secretary of lega-$16,000. We have also a consul at London and a secretary of legation. I am making no complaint. But I insist that the salary of the President of the United States, which has been cut down one-half, ought to bear some proportion to the salary of an embassador to London. If public necessity required a reduction of the salary of the President, might not a small reduction be made in this salary of $20,300 in gold of the embassador at London? I may be in error, but I am persuaded this proposed reduction in these foreign missions might be had without detriment to the public service.

Mr. President, I remember as a school-boy in this capital many, very many long years ago, that the highest salary paid to any min ister was to our representative at the court of St. James. He then received a salary of $9,000 per annum. We had then, in the persons of Rufus King, Richard Rush, Louis McLane, as able representatives as any country ever sent abroad.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask my friend if the minister did not get an outfit ?

Mr. STEVENSON. I was coming to that. He got, I believe, an outfit of about $9,000.

Mr. BAYARD. And an infit. Mr. SARGENT. Nine thousand dollars salary and $9,000 outfit and $4,500 infit.

Mr. STEVENSON. Nine thousand dollars salary and $4,500 infit, but he had no extras

Mr. SARGENT. What kind does the Senator mean?
Mr. STEVENSON. Such as are now awarded our ministers. If I am not in error, though I do not speak with entire accuracy, one of our ministers at London was not allowed the extraordinary expenses caused by having to put his household in mourning on the death of the King, or taking part in the coronation of the Queen, or many other necessary extraordinary expenses which sometimes occur abroad. These are now properly allowed, in addition to the salary.

I admit, Mr. President, that the cost of living and of every thing else has advanced greatly since that period. I am sure I desire that our ministers should be paid competent salaries. But I must say that they should bear some proportion to the salaries which are given to the President and his Cabinet. We know that the expenses of living are much more extravagant in Washington than in most of the Euare much more extravagant in Washington that it has been repean capitals. I cannot understand, if the salary of the President and his Cabinet are placed at $25,000 and at $8,000, why we cannot make a small reduction in some of our foreign ministers. Salaries of all public functionaries insidiously go up. They continually expand. all public functionaries insidiously go up. They continually expand. You rarely hear of their coming down without a public outcry against the injustice of such reduction. The House of Representatives, after the injustice of such reduction. The House of Representatives, after a full investigation, have attempted this reform. Will the Senate refuse to concur without testing the experiment? I agree fully to the sentiment so often expressed in this debate, that no Senator should feel bound to follow the House. By no means. We are here as Senators, upon our own individual sense of what is right and proper. I acknowledge that in the highest sense of official responsibility.

acknowledge that in the highest sense of official responsibility. Many Senators around me whom I honor and respect—and with whom politically I am accustomed to act—differ with me in the course which I feel it my duty to pursue in sustaining this proposed reduction.

It was my misfortune to differ with some of my political friends in reductions proposed by other appropriation bills during the present session. I am still on the saine line of retrenchment whenever it can be done without injury to the public service. It is an unpleasant duty, but the monetary depression which threatens almost national bankruptcy calls loudly for some effort in this line. I shall never be swerved from any vote which in my judgment duty demands; still less shall I ever utter a complaint against any other Senator in this Chamber who differs from me. I yield to all the same patriotic purpose and the same high resolve to promote the public good that I pose and the same high resolve to promote the public good that I would fain claim for myself. If Senators happen to see the same subject from different stand-points, we can all afford to differ, and at least yield our views to a majority of the Senate. I believe, in addition to the proposed reduction of salaries, that many of the smaller missions can in Europe as in Central America be amalgamated or united. If so, we can accomplish a healthy reduction in that line. If Congress intends in good faith to meet popular expectation by a large reduction of the annual expenditures of the National Government, it reduction of the annual expenditures of the National Government, it can only be done by lopping off and retrenching in every agency of the Government where it can be accomplished without actual injury. I am quite sure that very many items of expenditure can be reduced in the foreign service and many more can be entirely abolished. I find some of these contingencies at the respective courts are as follows:

That at Paris last year was $3,650.62; in Germany, $3,648.34; in England, $3,859.29; and so we go on.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether any portion of this fund he speaks of as being contingent entered into the personal expenses of the minister, or were they expenses that will arise, of an official and public character, necessarily in the execution of his duties?

Mr. SARGENT. They were for postage especially.
Mr. STEVENSON. I am sorry I cannot reply to the inquiry of my friend from Delaware. I have not looked to see what the real character of these contingencies was. I see them quoted as contingencies, acter of these contingencies was. I see them quoted as contingencies, but I do not know of what items of expenditure they are composed. The Senator from California says they are for postage especially. That may be so; I am only sorry the Committee on Appropriations cannot give us every item, to let the Senate see whether some of them might not be dispensed with. We have, in addition to the embassador, a secretary of legation and a consul also at London. They of course receive stated salaries at much less amounts than the amount paid the ministers.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me? He speaks of a minister having a consul. I would like to ask the Senator if he is aware that there is no connection between a minister and a consul in relation to their duties, and that the consul pays over to the Government of the United States somewhere about $52,000 annually above

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say the minister at London had a consul. I said there was a secretary of legation and a consul at London? I was aware that the minister at London and the consul there were independent positions; but I am not now aware, and I do not think the Senator from California is, nor do I think any human being can be, that the consul cannot and does not often perform many duties in the absence of the minister which, were he present, would devolve on him.

Mr. SARGENT. I say they are independent.

Mr. STEVENSON. Of course they are independent, and their salaries are independent. I meant to convey no other impression.

Mr. SARGENT. And that consul himself pays, as the result of the existence of his office, something over $50,000 into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am very glad to hear it. He deserves a good salary, and there is no proposition pending to reduce it. It is a great mistake to suppose that large salaries to ministers or to consuls enlarge our commerce. Commercial intercourse are the incidents of commerce, but do not create it. It is the sheerest fallacy to suppose that salaries to ministers or to consuls have any part in increasing or restricting our commerce. No, Mr. President, it is your protective policy which has crippled your commerce, and which if persisted in must destroy it. It is this unjust, restrictive policy—forbidding the building of ships where they can be built cheapest—this taxing of the materials and commodities which enter so largely in the building of ships, that has reduced within ten years past American tonnage so largely and increased that of Great Britain. I should delight to see this system of protection, which has so long shackled our commerce, utterly abandoned.

I should joyously welcome the triumph of a free, unrestricted American commerce, stripped of all protective restriction, whitening every sea with our ships and bearing to every shore under God's sky the fruit of our multiplied and varied industries, and hallowing the despotisms of the Old World with the gladsome light of the free institutions of the New. But this consummation is to be achieved by no scale of moneyed compensation to ministers or to commercial agents.

Remove the restrictions that have driven your shipping to foreign bottoms and make your commerce free.

But, Mr. President, I forbear. This subject of reducing salaries is always an unpleasant business. But, sir, it is a much sadder one to see the general depression and commercial gloom which, I am sorry to say, now like a great dark cloud darken every part of this land with their shadows. I am done. I rose to give the reasons which impelled me to support the pending provision in the bill which came from the House in its proposed reduction.

Mr. MORTON. One word, Mr. President. I am as much in favor of economy as the Senator from Kentucky; but it sometimes becomes a question, what is economy? If there is a desire to reduce these salaries there is a very plain way. A bill to reduce salaries may originate in this body. My friend has had all the session to introduce a bill to reduce the salary of the minister to Italy or to any other court. All that I was pointing out was this: that this legislation should be conducted according to the forms of congressional business. It has been found by hundreds of years of experience in parliamentary bodies that it is safer and better to divide the business up and let it be considered by appropriate committees. Under the guise of economy it is now proposed to trample all this experience under foot, economy it is now proposed to trample all this experience under foot, and that the Committee on Appropriations shall assume to itself to consider and determine all these questions. A few years ago, I believe some twenty-five or thirty, a bill was proposed creating the Department of the Interior. It was a long and carefully prepared act, considered by the proper committees. Suppose the Committee on Appropriations should assume that there is no necessity for that Department that the business expect to exact the Tree street Property. partment, that that business ought to go back to the Treasury Department, where much of it was formerly discharged, and they put it into the appropriation bill, striking out salaries for the Secretary of the Interior and all his officers and transferring that over to the Treasury Department. That is the precise principle involved in this bill. We have a question in both Houses, Where shall the Indians be taken care of? Shall it be under the charge of the Interior Department, the present system, or shall it be transferred to the War Department and put under the care of the Army? That is a proper question for the Committee on Military Affairs to consider. It is a proper ques-tion for the Committee on Indian Affairs to consider. But the Ap-propriation Committee comes in and cuts the Gordian knot, and takes the whole matter into its own hands, and relieves the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of it.

That is the theory of this bill. It seems to me that it is neither economy nor is it wise. If these radical changes are to be made, missions reduced or abolished, consulships raised, lowered, or abolished, these things should be passed upon by Congress in a separate bill. There is ample time and there is no necessity for crowding everything into is ample time and there is no necessity for crowding everything into the appropriation bills.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I was a member of this body long years ago when a bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations fixing and determining the salaries of our foreign ministers. It was many years ago. It was at a period of time when the scale of prices for all that a man would require to sustain life, to clothe and the state of the salaries of the salaries of the scale of prices for all that a man would require to sustain life, to clothe and the salaries of the salaries o feed him, either in this country or abroad, was vastly below that which exists to-day. It was a scale of salaries that was considered and carefully examined first by that committee to which it appropriately belonged, and it was then considered by both branches of Congress, and received their approbation. It is now proposed by the Committee on Appropriations of the House in the bill which they send to us to abolish a very large number of those missions and to reduce the salaries in ish a very large number of those missions and to reduce the salaries in a still larger number. Is it wise? Is it economy? We all know that these several ministers are the representatives of our Government abroad. We all know that they reflect very much the character of our people and our institutions, and that in other countries there is an impression which is produced by the character of the minister we send there. We all know that one of the duties devolving upon that minister is one of simple hospitality, first perhaps it may be to the citizens of our own country who may have occasion to go always a second of the citizens of the country to which casion to go abroad, and second to the citizens of the country to which he is accredited.

Taking then the fact that this was a scale of salaries agreed upon at a period of time when the price of everything was upon a lower scale than at present, taking the condition of these ministers at every court and the connection which they bear to our Government and the impress they are to make on the governments where they go by their ability in some degree to bestow those hospitalities that we as a people ought to be proud that they may be able to bestow, I think it is the worst of economies to seek to reduce them now. I adopt the argument of the Senator from Indiana as unanswerable, that there is no one committee composed of the best and most intelligent men, either in this body or in the other House, that can as well and as wisely determine what shall be done in relation to all the branches of the service as the various committees to which those subjects appropriately go.

Now, sir, take this matter of foreign ministers. We divide here in this body honestly upon what is the best policy of the country in relation to our tariff. We have here men who are protectionists per se, it may be; we have Senators who are free-trade men, or they so claim may be; we have Senators who are free-trade men, or they so claim to be. When you examine the subject carefully, you find that the one perhaps is not an ultra protectionist nor the other a free-trader; but we divide on the policy of our laws as to what extent in protection you shall go. I take up this bill, and I find first and foremost in tion you shall go. I take up this bill, and I find first and foremost in it that in five or six of the South American and Central American republics it has abolished our ministers. Is it wise? These republics are our neighbors. We ought to have a sympathy for them from our similarity of government. The commerce of these republics belongs to us, and we ought to have it. A wise statesmanship would give it to us—a statesmanship. I grant, that we have not exhibited for long years. When I turn to your tables of commerce, I find that year after year the commerce of these republics that ought to belong to us is dwindling away. And here you propose to strike a fatal blow and annihilate, in my judgment, the little that remains.

Let me address myself to the man who is the most liberal in his

Let me address myself to the man who is the most liberal in his construction in relation to revenue matters, and let me say to him that here is a field, and let me say also to the man who goes to the greatest extreme in seeking to protect the industries of our country by a system of tariff—let me say to all that here is a field in which you may open up a commerce of uncounted millions, if you will act wisely, worth more to the manufacturer and to the agriculturist of all parts of our country than any tariff law we can pass, be it free or be it restrictive. And how are we to maintain, or how, in other words, are we to increase these revenues and these commercial relations if we sever that connection which ought to exist between us and them by the appropriate diplomatic officers? We never can hold them in that way, and the remaining portion of the commerce of those countries which we still hold will vanish and go. We want the wisest and the best men we can get to place there for the purpose not of losing what we have got, but of securing new fields for our manufactures. There is to-day no implement of agriculture that is manufactured in the United States, I think, in which we cannot compete successfully with any country in the world and manufacture a better article, and there is no article that we manufacture that the uncultivated fields of these republics do not require.

How are we to secure these new fields for our commerce if we sever How are we to secure these new fields for our commerce it we sever our relations with them? In my judgment, Mr. President, it would be the unwisest thing in the world. I know we have grouped several of them together in times past. It would be a wiser policy to-day to dissever those groups and add to your diplomatic officers in these republics rather than to restrict them. That would be economy, although you might expend a few miserable dollars in doing it. You though you might expend a few miserable dollars in doing it. You will if you act wisely, in my judgment, seek every occasion to cultivate first the relations of intimacy with all these republics that are so near to us, and in doing that you will next seek to secure that commerce which, I repeat again, belongs to us and which in years past we had much more of than we have now. Did the Committee on Appropriations in the House consider all these questions?

Mr. President, you ruled rightly that we may not refer to the action of that body. We may take the bill as it is presented to us as the action of that body, and moon that bill we can justly and properly of that body. We may take the bill as it is presented to us as the action of that body, and upon that bill we can justly and properly comment. I may not ask, therefore, and consequently I do not ask, did the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives propose these changes in this bill? I may not ask it. Senators may know, however, how it is.

Then I turn to another portion of the bill and I find here is consulate after consulate abelished. And what are these little consuls? They are useful officers to our commerce all over the world; they are requisite for the protection of seamen; they are requisite for the protection of the commerce of our country; and they are useful for the projection of the Treasury, as my friend from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] suggests, to see that violations of the revenue laws of the country are properly guarded against by the certificates they shall give of the cost of the foreign article in that market, which is to be fransmitted to our own.

Mr. SARGENT. There are forty of them struck out.

Mr. HAMLIN Forty and more. The time was when I had a very accurate knowledge of the whole consular system of this country much more than I possess now; but I may say that I have still that knowledge of the consulates of our country which enables me to say that I believe I know there are consuls after consuls stricken out here the loss of which will embarrass the commerce of the country if the Senate shall agree to the measure.

Mr. MORTON. I will inquire of the Senator if either Committee on Commerce have been consulted?

Mr. HAMLIN. There again, Mr. President, under your ruling, I may not ask, and consequently I do not ask, if the Committee on Commerce in the House of Representatives were consulted and approved of this wholesale slaughter of our foreign consulates. I think I am authorized to read from newspapers, and to adopt the remarks which I find in the newspapers as part of what I say. I have not got the newspapers before me; but I do say, not what I hear in the House, but what I read in the newspapers, that the various committees in the House are at loggerheads because they have not been consulted upon these precise things.

Sir, before I will vote to make a wholesale slaughter of our consuls, I must have a report of the Committee on Commerce in the Senate. From the formation of the Government to the present time that committee has been intrusted with the duty of providing by proper laws for their appointment and by proper laws for the regulation of their duties. They are commercial officers; hence it has been appropriate that they should be considered by the Committee on Commerce.

I know, as the Senator from Virginia I think it was said, that we have precedents in abundance of regulating saleries if you please.

have precedents in abundance of regulating salaries, if you please, and of doing, I will admit, almost anything else by way of amendment to appropriation bills. I concede it; but never within the history of the Government has there been a time when the Appropriation Committee has sought to regulate the whole service of your country and to assume the control and regulation of every other committee that belongs to the legislative body. There have been large and sweeping amendments made upon the appropriation bills in relation to the Army; they have been made in relation to the Navy; but I think if Senators will go back to the Journals, I will not say that they will find in every instance, but in almost every instance they will find that those amendments have been prepared by the appropriate committees, and have therefore come to the body with the sanction of that committee to which the subject appropriately belonged. Consequently the precedents to which Senators refer have no relevancy and no application to this bill.

It is a vicious system of legislation. I am told that I must vote for this bill and vote the appropriations, or there is to be no appropriation bill. Well, sir, let it come; I only speak for myself, but I say, so vicious is that system that as one Senator I never will vote one dollar of appropriation under that limitation and under that threat dollar of appropriation under that limitation and under that threat of coercion. Other Senators will vote as their judgment leads them to believe is correct. Mine leading me to believe I am correct will restrain me from giving a vote under duress here. And this is in my judgment, I repeat, the poorest kind of economy. I will on all occasions when there shall be brought before this body any bill seeking to limit, diminish, or restrict the appropriations of the Government where they are now in excess, give to it my cordial support; but when a general system like this is presented, which seems to be the one that is to be adopted, I would not vote for that which of itself abstractly might be right if I have got to take it only upon condition that I must vote for that which I know to be wrong. I think the rule is a wrong one. I will join the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator when he will present a bill here and show me that the exigencies of the service require or that the service of the country will not be embarrassed or diminished—I will join with him in applying the proper corrective everywhere, while I will not join with him in being compelled to vote for a series of amendments, some of which I think I have knowledge enough to know are absolutely wrong and absolutely vicious. I cannot join with him because my judgment tells me the system is wrong and vicious and that it is an economy which all wise men would shun, and it is not true economy. It is the want of economy. If you do not give a fair and adequate compensation for the service performed, it is wrong; it is not economy.

Mr. President, when I rose I did not mean to say half what I have said, but taking this view, and letting this be all that I have to say upon this bill, I shall vote with all cheerfulness for the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations of this body, believing that they have acted wisely and for the best interests of the whole country. Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to ask of the Senator from Maine an explanation. Did I understand him to say that the commerce with South America had been decreasing recently?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir; largely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then, I desire to ask, has the number of commercial agents been increased there in the last fifteen years?

Mr. HAMLIN. Diminished.

Mr. HAMLIN. Diminished.
Mr. COCKRELL. In the last fifteen years prior to this bill?
Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir; diminished.
Mr. COCKRELL. I mean every year prior to this bill?
Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.
Mr. STEVENSON. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that from 1861 to 1874 there was a diminished American tonnage on American this of 7 277 810 tons.

from 1861 to 1874 there was a diminished American tonnage on American ships of 7,277,819 tons.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Between what years?

Mr. STEVENSON. Eighteen hundred and sixty-one and 1874, a period of thirteen years. I will state further that in 1860 the total American tonnage that entered British ports was 1,747,651 tons and the British tonnage that year was 1,136,364 tons. That was in 1860. Now we have had the high salaries, and in 1870 the American tonnage entering British ports was 479,670, while the British was 2,778,823 tons, and all our commerce now, I believe, or almost all comparatively, is carried by British bottoms, and not by American bottoms. It is a great mistake to suppose that salaries can increase commerce. Consuls and embassadors are the incidents of commerce; they do not create it; it is all a mistake to suppose so.

I go with my distinguished friend from Maine in all he says about the independence of the Senate and about having committees who have charge of the matter to consult with the Appropriation Committee, but at last it is the Appropriation Committee which has the right to recommend these appropriations. Why, sir, we passed a treaty here not long since—I believe I may mention it as a matter of history—and yet I am informed from the papers that treaty has not yet become effective. I suppose that the House of Representatives, the branch of the Government which the Constitution denominates the power to originate revenue bills, would not vote any appropriation until they had examined thoroughly into the history and bearing of every treaty that comes before them. So it is, I suppose, in a similar way with the Appropriation Committee, that they will not agree to recommend any appropriations until they know that the public service will be benefited thereby.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator sits down, I wish to ask him a question in reference to what he has just said about the tonnage of the United States in 1860 and 1871, or whatever the time was. The Senator says it has vastly diminished since 1860, if I understand him. Mr. STEVENSON. I said in that period of thirteen years, from 1861 to 1874, the diminution against American shipping was 7,277,819

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I wish to ask the Senator in all fairness to state to the Senate whether he is not aware—

Mr. STEVENSON. Of the war?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That the rebellion swept from the seas substantially the whole of American commerce?

Mr. STEVENSON. I suppose that had a great deal to do with it, and I did not desire to conceal that fact; but even before that the gentleman must know that our American shipping had virtually gone

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it has virtually gone down.
Mr. STEVENSON. So the Senator will agree with me.
Mr. EDMUNDS. It went down under the arms of the rebellion, and it will take a great deal of time to cure that wound that the rebellion inflicted on our country. I am glad to know that at this present day it is beginning to revive. But to have the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who knew so much about the rebellion and the devastation that it created, bring forward that circumstance as a reason why these salaries should be reduced rather astonishes me, I

Mr. STEVENSON. I am more astonished at the Senator from Vermont, who undertakes, as he always does, to bring in the rebellion against a simple statement of fact that the increase of salaries did not create commerce. Does he say that it does? The rebellion has ended for more than ten years, and will the Senator go back five years and try it and show whether the shipping occupies the same position now it did then?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, with the greatest possible respect to my friend, I shall always bring in the rebellion whenever it bears upon the subject under consideration. I am not in the least afraid of it. I am not afraid of being misunderstood about it. The rebellion is a great factor in the present distress of this country, and as such I do not intend to shut up my eyes to it; and when I see my honorable friend, a leader of the democratic party here, urging a pinching down of salaries that were established before the rebellion, upon the ground that our commerce on theseas has fallen off, and omitting to give any other reason for it than the fact that he may suppose there were too many representatives and consult abroad, I feel obliged, with great deference to him, (I hope it does not cut him or hurt his feelings,) to refer to what is the fact, as he has admitted, that our commerce was swept from the seas by the rebellion. If that disturbs anybody's equanimity it must be his misfortune, for I shall certainly allude to it every time it is a fair element in the consideration of any question; when it is not, I shall not, as a matter of course. But I do not know that we have yet got to that state of beatification that we cannot refer to a public historical fact which relates to a that we cannot refer to a public historical fact which relates to a subject under consideration without somebody getting greatly disturbed and imputing to people motives in referring to the rebellion. Now, Mr. President, let us come to the case in hand. The commerce of the United States has fallen off since 1860. The reasons for its falling off I have stated to have been the effect of the rebellion. I repeat it, and everybody knows it. But, I take it, it does not follow, because our commerce has been destroyed by the rebellion, that we should drive nails into its coffin by undertaking to destroy all the representatives commercial and diplomatic that we have in countries representatives, commercial and diplomatic, that we have in countries with whom we have commerce in order to finish up the performance. That is the effect of it. We talk about economy, Mr. President, and we ought to at all times, and we ought to practice it; but we ought not to save at the spigot and waste at the bung, as the expression is. Economy is an honest preservation of the public money from being expended for useless and unnecessary purposes. Economy does not consist in failing to meet the necessary and indispensable expenses of the Government, I take it. I do not know any such economy.

The question, therefore, is, speaking broadly, whether we shall continue to endeavor to encourage and revive the commerce of the United States by keeping up closer commercial and diplomatic intercourse with the countries with which we are in relations, in order to stimulate in every possible way the development of our trade and the sale of our products, or whether we shall pursue the scheme that is adopted in this bill, of diminishing this service, putting every branch of it upon short allowance, striking out entirely large proportions of it, and then wait for events to revive our commerce. That is the question. If anybody can point out a salary anywhere in this bill that can be shown by the report of any committee on appropriations, or otherwise, to be unnecessarily large, (although it is entirely the wrong way to do business, in an appropriation bill to change the laws, and I have generally resisted with all the power I possess that sort of legislation,) I shall cheerfully vote to reduce it; but nobody in this debate, no committee that I have heard of anywhere, has undertaken by any inquiry or investigation—as numerous as they are—to show that any one of these salaries to our ministers or consuls abroad is in excess of the necessary requirements of that station.

If you are to send a citizen of the United States to Great Britain, if you please, as the minister of our Government, do you not expect to pay him what it will cost him to live there in decent, not ostentatious, respectability? If you do not, then you must occupy one of two grounds: you must either say that you will only select the wealthy citizens of this country for the stations of public trust and honor or you will leave it to the poor ones that may be appointed to make up what is necessary to their livelihood by devious ways. Which does the honor of the Government require? Does anybody who professes to be a democrat or a republican wish to establish in this country the idea that wealth is an indispensable prerequisite to the holding of office and the discharging of public trusts? I take it not. Does anybody in this country intend to advance the proposition that we shall put men into office who are not sufficiently paid to keep them out of the temptation of doing wrong? I take it not. Therefore, Mr. Presi-dent, I assume that everybody will agree that every one of these salaries, taken by itself, ought to be large enough to support any citizen of the United States, without calling upon his private means, in that just and proper and simple republican maintenance of his establishment which belongs to the character of our nation and to enable him to discharge the duties he is called upon to perform.

If you apply that test, and I believe everybody will agree that it is a just one, where do you find yourself? Has any committee undertaken to report in respect of the expenses at the court of St. James, that it has been found that the minister of the United States at that court has been making money out of his office; that the salary was too great for his just necessities of livelihood? I have not heard any too great for his just necessities of livelihood? I have not heard any such information at all. It seems that those who arranged this bill—I must assume that it was the Department or somebody; I cannot assume that it was the House of Representatives; I have no right to refer to it, and I do not assume that it was—instead of making an inquiry into the expenses of the British mission, the necessary and just expenses of it, have taken an arithmetic and slate and sat down and made a division which would cut horizontally over everything. If that is economical or even respectable legislation, I do not understand what that sort of legislation is.

There is one mission that I happen to know something about personally, and I only speak of it as an illustration, and that is the mission to Italy. I have seen the house in which the American minister to Italy lives—the second story of a house, the first story being let to other occupants, and the third story being let to other occupants. He lives in an obscure and quiet street; and yet in the city of Rome, where the salary is now $12,000, it takes, if I am correctly informed, although my information is not recent, and not with reference to any bill of this sort, over one-third of the salary of that minister to pay the simple rent of that flat, in a little old stone house in a back street. Then, when you proceed to the other expenses of missions, think of the constant drain upon our ministers everywhere to take care of the needy, destitute citizens of the United States, and provide the means of their getting home—not an official duty which the statute enjoins, I admit, but a duty which the national honor, and the national charity, and the national pride absolutely enforce upon every one of our min-isters and consuls whenever they find a case of distress among the isters and consuls whenever they find a case of distress among the citizens of our country. Although such expenditure is paid really out of their private pocket, their private pocket is replenished by the amount of the salary which the United States pays them, and where they are poor men, of course they cannot pay it in any other way. Does anybody wish to cut short, at any one of these missions furnishing our minister, if he pays it out of his own salary, a salary sufficient to enable him to do semething in the way of charity to our ficient to enable him to do something in the way of charity to our destitute citizens who are stranded abroad? I take it not. Does anybody here wish to prevent an American minister at any one of these courts, if an American citizen comes to him respectable, wishing to observe the governments of foreign countries, and to bring home some knowledge useful here, from asking him to dine, or to sup, or to breakfast, and to meet distinguished citizens there from whom he can gain information in that country? I take it not. Does anybody here expect that an American minister is to do his duty, and shut himself up in his lodgings without going into the society of the capital to which he is accredited, in order that he may perform his duty, and make himself thoroughly acquainted with the operations of society and government in that country? I take it not. But do you intend any minister of ours to be mean enough to go and dine with every-body else, and never ask any of the people who have shown him hospitality to break bread with him? I take it not.

Mr. President, we must apply the good sense of economy to all such questions as this; and you must provide under the head of salary to these ministers a fund limited, scrutinized carefully I agree, but you must provide a fund out of which they can do those ten thousand things which are necessary to the welfare and to the honor of our country. When you come to look at that view of the case, $17,500 at Great Britain, or $12,000 at Rome, and so on, fail, really fail, to make up the indispensable expenses of these gentlemen. In the case of Italy, I happen to know it personally, and there are Senators within the sound of my voice, if they have not gone out recently, who have declined more than one of these missions in the course of the last five years, upon the simple ground that the compensation attached to the office was not sufficient to enable them to meet the expense, not that display, or splendor, or ostentation might call for, but those simple and necessary objects of expenditure to which I have alluded. And yet Senators propose to cut down by one-third still.

Mr. President, somebody has talked about the demands of the people. The people whom I represent specially do not demand anything of the kind. They demand economy. They always have, and always will. They demand honesty and fair play, and I hope they will continue to do that, and I have no doubt they will; and therefore I extent to be instified when I yet to continue a solar at what the law. pect to be justified when I vote to continue a salary at what the law has fixed it, unless it is made apparent by some estimate and informas used it, unless it is made apparent by some estimate and information about the expenses relating to the discharge of that office that the salary is too high. When that is made apparent I shall most cheerfully vote to reduce it, and until that time I certainly shall not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. O, let us finish this bill.
Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not want to interfere with this bill, but there is some business in executive session which will Mr. SARGENT. It is too early yet; five o'clock will do.
Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not like to interfere with

Mr. SARGENT. I trust the Senator will withdraw the motion. It

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then I give notice that to-morrow at three o'clock I will ask the Senate to go into executive session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate nor do I intend to discuss the question of salaries. The question of salaries, what they ought to be, is not germane at all to this bill. I can conceive of nothing more strangely out of place than the idea of undertaking to determine upon an appropriation bill what the service ought to be. The first thing and the only thing is, What is the service as established by law? The duty of an appropriation committee is not legislative at all in any important sense whatever; it is administrative simply. Mr. President, unless we observe the fundamental distinctions between legislation and appropriation, this session will end when the next session begins in December next. As the Senator from Indiana has well said, there is no end to what may the Senator from Indiana has well said, there is no end to what may be said, must be said if everybody deems it expedient to become eloquent over the public service on an appropriation bill, and undertakes to say what it ought to be. Who of us here now are competent to settle that question, having the proper information on that subject? The Committee on Foreign Relations might be presumed to know something in regard to the relations of this part of the public service; but what is the general information in this body on that question? Does any Senator here outside of that committee feel himself competent to decide that question? Is there a Senator here who from the beginning of the session expected to be called upon on an appropration bill to say what this service ought to be? No, sir. Why? Because on this class of subjects it is not open to discussion; the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate, admonished by the Senator from Vermont as well as the rulings of the Chair—I do not allude to the House at all—but the duties of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate are all done and consummated when they have told the Senate what the public service requires; and what the pubtook the Senate what the public service requires; and what the public service requires is what the law has stipulated. What the public service requires, that is the obligation; and it is an obligation resting on each member of Congress precisely as much as it rests anywhere else; and an appropriation committee has no function whatever in regard to the change of it. If either branch of this Congress undertakes to violate that fundamental principle of all legislative appropriation there is no end to the debate which must arise in this Congress. Senar or later both hereals a most account of the contract of the contrac Congress. Sooner or later both branches must come to comprehend that question. We divide here on the matter; we wrangle here, if you please—though perhaps I ought not to use that word—as to what the public service ought to be. It ends in—what? It ends in simply the majority voting down the minority.

Suppose it were possible that the two branches of Congress should divide on the question, then the public service remains precisely as it began; neither branch of Congress has the authority or the power to change the public service so much as a single salary. That is a question of legislation, and can only be effected by the concurrent action of both branches of Congress and the approval of the President acting in perfect harmony. If Senators remember that fact, we shall see at once the impropriety, not to say absurdity, of one branch undertaking to revolutionize the public service without the assent of It cannot be done.

What is the rule that underlies all this? By the comity, by the usage, the House of Representatives, ordinarily, generally initiates the appropriation bills. It is of no great consequence which House initiates the measure; but ordinarily the House of Representatives does it. There is neither law, nor Constitution, nor joint rule of the bodies, which makes that imperative. According to my notion it may be done by either body. It is, as a matter of fact, ordinarily done by the House of Representatives, I repeat. What is expected to be done? To appropriate is simply to make a provision for the public service as it is established by law; and the moment that either branch of Congress established by law; and the moment that either branch of Congress departs from that rule, and undertakes to legislate upon an appropriation bill, it has violated a fundamental principle of legislation and made it impossible to have anything like independent legislation. Either branch of Congress which undertakes to change the public service on an appropriation bill is an innovator. It is an unauthorized and unparliamentary innovation. That is what it is. What is the result of it? If the other branch shall not agree to it, what is to be done? Is the bill to fail? Is Congress to give up? Are we to sit here the year round and make no appropriation because one branch be done? Is the bill to fail? Is Congress to give up? Are we to sit here the year round and make no appropriation because one branch of Congress violates a well recognized and fundamental principle of all legislation? No; that would not do. So what would be the result of it? If the other branch does not agree to it, then the branch innovating must back down. The moral sense of the public would demand it; their own returning sense would require it; and if the Senate of the United States would refuse to do a thing of that sort, I would refuse to be its agent on this floor instantly. If we present in an appropriation hill a matter of legislation distinctly by itself I would refuse to be its agent on this floor instantly. If we present in an appropriation bill a matter of legislation distinctly by itself, we are innovating on a fundamental principle of all legislation; and if the other House does not agree to it, the bill is not to fail, but the innovating party must submit, must withdraw from the innovation. That is the principle we should all recognize; that is a principle so high in morals, so absolutely obligatory in law, so binding by every principle of parliamentary law and comity, that no branch can stand in the face of it. The public sense would be shocked by a condition of things by which the two branches of Congress would become interlocked here and the public business of the country put to a standstill because one branch or the other had taken it into its head to force the other branch into submission by putting such a rider upon a money bill essential to the progress of the Government from day to day, on pain of forcing the loss of the bill.

Mr. President, these are the circumstances under which we are legislating. L is neither optional with us nor with any other branch to propose to us an innovation of the public service upon one of these bills. Fundamental principles underlie the law; and however much we may squabble about it here, and howsoever much time we may spend in the end, either here in open Senate or in conference, we shall | master-General, transmitting the draught of a bill to enable that offiall of us come to recognize the principle which underlies all wholesome legislation, that this bill must be kept free, absolutely free. I do not mean to say that an appropriation bill may not be amended. It may. The public service may be changed. It may be changed by the recommendation of proper committees of the Senate and House having jurisdiction over those questions; but what I am arguing is against the impropriety of undertaking to regulate the public service on these particular money bills. Nothing can be more pernicious, nothing is more unsound, and nothing is more unauthorized as matter of legislation.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the features of this bill. Altogether the bill as reported to the Senate by our committee, as I understand it, is strictly in harmony with the public service as established by law. That is enough for the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to know. It is all they have a right to propose to the Senate. An experience of some eight or ten years in connection with this branch of the service, so far as appropriating is concerned, leads me to agree with my colleague that the best interests of the public will be subserved by appropriating in the bill substantially for the service as it is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I will now ask the Senator from California to consent that I shall make a motion for an executive

Mr. SARGENT. On the suggestion of a number of Senators around me and knowing that the business is important, I consent; but to-morrow I shall insist on disposing of this bill.

No. 2922) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make allowances for compensation to collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to February 8, 1875, upon final settlements of their accounts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. HUBBELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2923) extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. HUBBELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2924) to promote officers of the Army as provided in section 1204 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. LEMERT.

Mr. SOUTHARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2925) making provision for the payment for a horse to George A. Lemert, late a captain in Company F, Ninety-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the war of 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES C. LINDSEY.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2926) granting a pension to James C. Lindsey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL WEITZEL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, asking that the law be so modified as to permit General Weitzel, United States Army, to accept the position of trustee of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk be passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments.

A bill to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments.

Be itenacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, during each and every year from and after July 1, 1876, and until the legal-tender notes of the United States shall be appreciated to par value with gold and shall be convertible into coin, to cause to be set aside and retained in coin an amount equal to 3 per cept. of such legal-tender notes outstanding; and, from the date of such convertibility as aforesaid, the amount of coin set aside and retained as aforesaid shall be held as a resumption fund in respect to said legal-tender notes, and shall at no time be less than 30 per cent. of such outstanding legal-tender notes: Provided, however, That the coin so set aside and retained as above provided shall be counted as a part of the sinking fund for the purchase or payment of the public debt, as required by section 3694 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of each national banking association during each and every year from and after July 1, 1876, and until the full and complete resumption of the payment in specie of its circulating notes, to set aside and retain from the eoin receivable as interest on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for its circulation an amount equal to 3 per cent. of its circulating notes issued to such association, and not surrendered; and from the date of its resumption of specie payments as aforesaid the amount of coin to be held and maintained as a resumption fund shall at no time be less than 30 per cent. of its outstanding circulation: Provided, however, That the coin by this section directed to be set aside and retained shall be counted as a part of the lawful money reserve which said associations are by existing laws required to maintain.

the House on this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] is a member, would be a very proper committee to consider this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill is printed.
Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to divide the several propositions embraced in the bill, so as to have a separate vote on the last section. The SPEAKER. It is not.
Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will allow that. Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague can arrange the matter so that separate votes may be had. I ask him to do that.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield for any purpose. Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to inquire whether the bill as read by the Clerk is precisely the bill known as the "Payne bill," which is printed. The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to answer that inquiry. Mr. HOSKINS. Then I inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE.]

Mr. HOSKINS. Then I inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE.]

Mr. PAYNE. I answer that it is precisely that bill without change. I wish to explain, however, that it is not the bill which has been here-tofore introduced in the House.

The SPEAKER. Explanations, which are in the nature of debate, are not in order. The gentleman from Ohio calls for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire whether this bill does not violate the public faith pledged to the sinking fund?

Mr. RANDALL and others objected to debate.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] refuses to yield for any purpose.

Mr. KASSON. I believe it is in order to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Of the Chair.

Mr. KASSON. Then I will ask the Chair whether this bill does not violate the pledge of the United States to maintain the sinking fund?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no authority to answer any question of that kind.

Mr. KASSON. Therefore I should be glad to have an answer from the gentleman from Ohio.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Grant, his Secretary; and further it was announced that the President had approved and signed, on March 25, 1876, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army; and An act (H. R. No. 198) to relieve the disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Virginia.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the rules be suspended so as to enable the House to take a recess daily for three days of the present week, to wit: Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday at half past four o'clock p. m., until half past soven o'clock p. m. pose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I believe experience has shown that at this period of the session we can do more work if we sit until half past five o'clock each day. If members will agree to sit each day until half past five o'clock, and work on this legislative appropriation bill, they will do more work than they would by adjourning at half past four, and com-ing here to attend a night session, and having a call of the House to compel the attendance of a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. My judgment is, and I think it is that of the Committee on Appropriations, that it will be better for us to have evening sessions now during the cool weather than to be forced to have them near the end of the session.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 78.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is necessary to consume time by callanight session any day he desires by a majority vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I prefer to have the yeas and nays. I wish to relieve the Committee on Appropriations of any responsibility for delay in the transaction of the public business.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 152, nays 71, not voting 66; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to permit Thomas Moran to exhibit two paintings at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia; and A joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-routes.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT SAND BEACH BAY.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2927) for the government and control of the harbor of refuge at Sand Beach Bay, on Lake Huron, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MUTCHLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department have permission to sit during the sessions of the House.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill in relation to the deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Sayler in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. If in order I desire now to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the printed bill insert there words:

Provided. That all such coin shall be exchangeable at par by the assistant treasurers and designated depositaries for United States notes in sums not less than $3; and shall be receivable for postage and revenue stamps, and for all dues to the United States except customs, in sums not over $5, and shall be redeemed on presentation at the Treasury of the United States in such sums and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, also, That the total issue of such coin shall not exceed at their nominal value the sum of $50,000,000

I belive that by order of the House the length of Mr. RANDALL. speeches in this debate is limited to fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Lan-

DERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me for the discussion of this question I cannot go into details. I very much regret, sir, to be compelled to take issue with the committee that reported this bill, a majority of whom are democrats. This bill, as reported its to aid in carrying out the first section of the resumption act of 1875, that was voted against by every democrat, then a member of this House, and an act, the repeal of which has been called for by two conventions held in my State, and which will undoubtedly be called for by the democratic convention yet to assemble. All parties in my district condemn this law, and would alike rejoice to hear of its repeal.

I regret that a bill to carry out any provision of this odious and bankrupting legislation of the republican party should be brought forward and supported by this House.

This act proposes a change in our financial system by changing the character of our legal-lender money into an interest-bearing debt, thus increasing it nearly $400,000,000. The interest on such increase at 5 per cent. per annum would amount to nearly $20,000,000, to be paid by increased taxation.

Mr. Chairman, the decline in values and the bankruptcy incident to the withdrawal of so large a volume of currency from business circles, being more than one-half our present volume, as is provided in this resumption act, can only be counted by the billions. This act is an "elephant" on the hands of the republican party. They are at a loss to know what to do with it, as is shown by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in refusing to commence redemption with $12,000,000 silver on hand.

$12,000,000 silver on hand.

They are anxious to saddle it upon democrats, and have us assume the responsibility and risk of a failure in carrying out its provisions. I regret, sir, that some democrats here are willing to assist in the management of their "elephant." Were we invited to the feast when the law was passed? So far from being willing to divide honors with you, the gag was applied and you were compelled to vote without an opportunity of expressing in any way your views upon this important question.

Mr. Chairman, this bill can have no other effect than to give your support to the Secretary of the Treasury in carrying out one of the provisons of this same act, so bitterly opposed by democrats at its passage. The principle of increasing the interest-bearing obligations of the Government and the contraction of the currency I protest against. The provisions of this bill cannot be carried out without a sale of Government and the least of the contraction of the currency I protest against. ernment bonds to take up the fractional currency

Mr. Chairman, the office this currency has performed has been sat-'isfactory, and the people are satisfied with it, and the party that re-tires this currency and fails to furnish some other equally as good will be held to strict account.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to see members here so hasty in imposing Mr. Chairman, I regret to see members here so hasty in imposing legislation upon the country. The people do not ask the enforcement of this resumption act, but demand its repeal. Will you carry out their wishes? The vote upon this bill will show who are to control legislation. You now have the power, and if you expect the people to trust you again, you must do their bidding. This resumption act has been a failure; it has but few friends. Since the passage of the law business is everywhere paralyzed and bankruptcy frightfully on the increase.

The national bankers are now hedging against the ruin that the enforcement of this law will bring to their business. They know resumption is impossible with their present volume of currency and the small amount of gold within their reach to redeem with. They are retiring their currency, and consequently adding additional burdens to business operations.

Mr. Chairman, since the Secretary of the Treasury commenced the enforcement of this law, I understand he has sold bonds and bought bullion to the amount of $16,000,000. Twelve millions have been coined. All this is idle. Money is the tool of business, and like tools, coined. All this is idle. Money is the tool of business, and like tools, amounts to nothing when unemployed.

I am opposed to keeping money unemployed. We need not stop to abuse republicans for selling our bonds that are now on interest and keeping this silver hoarded. We should act in a way that will promote the best interest of the Government, while we are here to represent it. In view of this, I have a substitute to offer for the second section of the bill. It gives the Secretary power to pay out on debts against the United States all the coin now on hand and to be coined out of the bullion on hand in any to way, way, as he may received. be coined out of the bullion on hand, in such way as he may prescribe. This money should be put in circulation to do the business of the country. Should there be more than is required to do the business, there is provision for the retirement of fractional currency. When legal-tender notes are preferred fractional currency, they can be exchanged at the Treasury of the United States on demand. Some will say this is inflation, but I hope our hard-money friends will not express an increase of hard money. oppose an increase of hard money.

Mr. Chairman, the currency has been contracted more than $40.

000,000 since this resumption act was passed. Cannot we afford to put in circulation $16,000,000 of silver coin? This would to some extent relieve business, and confidence would be somewhat restored. It would be a declaration that we did not intend to enforce the resumption act. If the committee will amend this bill so as to provide for the purchase of bullion, out of which to coin money and make silver a full legal tender, as gold now is, and would make no provision for the retirement of fractional currency, I would regard it as a wise measure and worthy of support.

The interest on the bonds is payable in coin. Silver is coin, the same as-gold, according to our Constitution. Then why keep it demonetized, when we can make it useful in paying the interest on the public debt?

The country was looking hopefully to this House, it being democratie, and always regarded as the supporter of legislation in the interest of the productive industry of the country. They expected, and had a right to expect, that all Government money be made of equal value, so as to have one currency for all, as declared in the democratic platform made in New York in 1868. This could be done at once if we would require the Government to receive her own notes for debts due her and make silver a full legal tender. When we propose to make legal-tenders receivable for tariff dues the question is: How will you pay the interest on your public debt?

I answer, that all Government money, both coin and paper, would be par and of equal value. We have an abundance of bullion, both silver and gold, that is transported to foreign countries annually. Invest your legal-tender notes in silver and gold bullion, coin it, and pay the interest on your public debt with it.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Chairman, the act of January 14, 1875, authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury, as rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined at the mints of the United States silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of stand-The country was looking hopefully to this House, it being democratic, coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, and to issue these coins in redemption of an equal number and amount of fractional currency of similar denominations; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for such redemption, authorizes him to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, the bonds of the United States to the extent necessary to carry the act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes named in the act, one of which is the redemption of the fractional currency.

Under and by virtue of these provisions of the law the Secretary of the Treasury has caused silver coins of the denominations named in the act to be coined, and on the 25th of January, 1876, there was in the Treasury $11,202,258.60 of silver coins and $4,146,932.67 of silver bullion, and on the 24th day of February last of silver coins and bullion $14,193,618.70. This act in express terms authorizes and requires the Secretary to cause silver of the denominations named to be coined, and to issue them in redemption of fractional currency, and upon such issue authorizes and requires him to redeem an equal amount of fractional currency until the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

The provisions of this act, so far as applicable to the coining of silver and the issue of silver coins in redemption of the fractional currency, seem to be sufficiently definite and explicit, without further legislation, to require the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the silver coin now in the Treasury and to apply it to the redemption of the fractional currency. But a doubt seems to exist whether or not the time for the issue of the silver coins is not, at least to some extent, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. And for the purpose of removing this doubt the bill now pending before the House in its second section expressly directs the Secretary to issue the silver coins now in the Treasury in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency.

This bill, introduced merely to make definite and certain the re-demption of the fractional currency with silver coins as intended by the act of January 14, 1875, has been made the pretext for a somewhat the act of January 14, 1875, has been made the pretext for a somewhat violent attack upon the republican party by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] in his speech a few days since. The gentleman seems to think that his party, the democratic party, will be held responsible for the legislation upon this subject of a republican Congress, by an act which proposes simply to remove a doubt as to the time when what is required by the act of the last Congress shall be done. He need have no fears on this ground. The act of January 14, 1875, was passed by a republican Congress and approved by a republican President; and so far as the pending bill is a remedy for any defect in that act, if it is passed it will be upon the suggestion of a republican Secretary of the Treasury, by the democrats and republicans of a democratic House, with the assent of a republican Senate and the approval of a republican President. It may therefore be hoped that the appeal of the gentleman from New York will not de-feat the bill, but that it may be considered without regard to party and solely upon its merits, and with a view simply to the best interests of the country.

About thirteen millions of silver coins of the denominations of ten, About thirteen millions of silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents are now in the Treasury. What shall be done with these coins? No one suggests that they shall be any longer held in the Treasury. The complaint is that they have already been kept there for too long a period.

The opponents to the issue of these coins in redemption of the fractional currency say: "Dispose of them immediately for use in the mechanical arts or as bullion for export to other countries, and apply the proceeds to some obligation of the Government." To issue these coins now, they say, for the purpose of circulation in the place of the fractional currency, is a "blunder," for which let the republican party be held responsible.

Mr. Chairman, the republican party, I think, is willing to assume the responsibility of an attempt to redeem the fractional currency in silver coins as proposed in the act of January 14, 1875, and in the pending bill, and to make that attempt now, in the hope that the rewill justify the reasonable expectation that the silver coins issued will be kept in circulation and be used as currency in place of the fractional currency. If this can be done, it will be a step in the right direction. For it is certainly advisable to substitute the money of direction. For it is certainly advisable to substitute the money of the Constitution for a fractional paper currency, justified only by the extreme necessity of the Government, and receivable for public dues, except customs, only to the extent of $5 and exchangeable for legal-tenders only in sums above $3.

It is a very small kind of currency to be issued by a Government of 40,000,000 people and holding the first place among the nations of the world. If what is recognized as money by every commercial people can be substituted for this scrip it will be a creditable thing for the Government, even if it can go no further in the same direction by redeeming the legal-tenders in gold and silver.

by redeeming the legal-tenders in gold and silver.

But it is said that the silver coins if issued cannot be kept in circulation as currency. If this is so, it may be wise to melt and dispose of them for other uses. It seems to me, however, that this step may be safely taken now. Silver is of less value in gold now than legal-tenders; and, if it shall so continue, as it will, until gold is at a premium of 20 per cent., there is no reason to suppose that silver coins when issued will not be kept in circulation as currency. Nor is it probable that silver will increase in value or that the premium on gold will go beyond 20 per cent. The product of silver is increasing from year to year, and the highest premium on gold for the last five years was in 1873, when it reached 19½ per cent., and during these years fluctuated between 15½ and that point.

And, besides this, the experience of the past shows that about the amount of fractional currency now outstanding is required as currency in the trade and business of the country in small transactions. If, then, the fractional currency is redeemed and an equal amount of silver coins of the same denominations is issued, the volume will be the same and the necessity for its use for change will keep it in circulations.

culation as currency

In addition to this, silver coins have a value, irrespective and independent of the value of silver bullion for use in the mechanical arts or for export. Fractional currency is not a legal tender for any amount. Under $3$ it cannot be exchanged for anything which is a legal tender. Silver coins to the extent of $5$ are a legal tender for all debts and obligations. Silver coin therefore is equally good for circulation as fractional currency, and is preferable to it, inasmuch as it is by law a legal tender for the payment of all debts under $5$. For these reasons, if no other existed, the silver coins now in the Treasury should be substituted for the fractional currency.

Treasury should be substituted for the fractional currency. But there is another reason which commends this bill to the favorable consideration of the House. It is not only in the direction of specie payments but it is also in the direction of economy. The fractional currency is easily defaced, torn, and mutilated. It must be retired, and new issues made from time to time to keep it in a fit condition for use and circulation. The estimates show that this can be done only at an annual expense to the Treasury of about a million of dollars. The substitution of silver coins for the fractional currency will save this amount annually to the Treasury. The silver coins when issued will continue for half a century as fit for use as when first issued from the mints.

But it is said that the Government has the use of the amount of the fractional currency in circulation, and that this is more than an equivalent for the large expenditure required for its annual renewal, because the interest which the Government will lose or have to pay on the money or bonds which are required to obtain the silver coin is greater than the expense now required to renew from time to time the currency. But it is only to the extent of the difference between this interest and the cost of supplying fractional currency that the Government will suffer any loss in its revenues.

But besides this the fractional currency is a debt which sooner or later must be met and paid by the Government just as its legal-tenders and bonds are a debt which must some time be met and paid. And when it is paid the Government has only discharged its obligation, and from that time only ceases to derive a benefit which it previously had by a refusal to meet its just obligation. By redeeming the fractional currency in lawful money the Government merely pays a debt, and in no true sense loses anything, unless it is entitled to receive interest upon what it owes.

As well, then, upon the ground that the substitution of silver coin for fractional currency is in the direction of resuming specie payments, as for the reason that by such substitution an annual expense of a million of dollars will be saved to the Treasury, this measure ought to receive the approval of the House, without regard to its political effect, either upon the democratic or republican party.

either upon the democratic or republican party.

It may be but a small beginning in the direction of resuming specie payments. It will, however, I hope, prove to be only the beginning of the end, and ultimately lead to the payment in lawful money of the legal-tender notes of the United States.

The appearance of silver coin as a part of the currency will to some extent restore confidence in the purpose of the Government to meet its other obligations in lawful money, and will be a step in the direction of restoring the money of the Constitution and of the commercial world as the only standard of value in the transactions of business compares and trade.

business, commerce, and trade.

In the hope that such will be the result I shall give my vote for the bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the committee the other day, I listened with interest, and not without admiration, to some portions of the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt.] He brought to the attention of the House statistics not altogether new on this floor, but facts bearing upon the proposition of the committee that were pertinent and proper facts to consider while acting on a bill like this; facts which cannot be brought to our attention too often or impressed upon us too deeply. And for these reasons I more deeply regretted the closing part of the gentleman's speech, when he took his statistics, the valuable opinions he owed the country, and his eloquence, and trailed them all in the pool of partisan politics. And, sir, when that speech is read, as it will be read throughout the country, the people will first admire the mind which brought to the attention of this House those facts so pertinent and so necessary, and will then regret that the men upon this floor are unable upon this question to rise above all party and give to their country what that country has the right to ask are unable upon this question to rise above all party and give to their country what that country has the right to ask.

Now what is this bill? When we first assembled here the Treasury Department, through its proper officer, estimated for $163,000 to print the Government notes, as is reported in the first section of this bill, and for $250,000 to print the fractional currency. We are to-day, so the Secretary of the Treasury informed me on Saturday, on the very eve of a famine for want of fractional currency, and we have seen for six weeks part of the machinery of the Government stopped. We have seen the employés of the Printing Bureau discharged or furloughed, and to-day this necessary wheel of the Government machinery is arrested because Congress has been unable to meet the question, and the country witnesses the remarkable spectacle of a block in necessary Government business, certain to result in mischief to the commerce of the country, in order that a partisan point be made or a market found for the unmerchantable silver of Nevada.

made or a market found for the unmerchantable silver of Nevada.

Now, what is the question? Instead of furnishing this $250,000 to print the fractional currency up to the end of the fiscal year, the Committee on Appropriations bring in a bill to issue this subsidiary silver coin. Now mark the proposition. We have, since we passed the resumption act, been buying a good deal more than one-third of the whole silver product of our mines. We have not issued it. It is not in circulation. We have of that silver held back nearly two-fifths of the whole product of those mines. And in the face of that fact it has diminished in value in that the product of the second that fact it has diminished in value in that the second that fact it has diminished in value in that time more than 5 per cent. There is but one question in this bill, and that question I wish to impress upon this House. We have already two standards of value, gold and legal-tender; and now this House in this bill proposes to have a third, that of subsidiary silver coin. I warn the House that the moment this subsidiary silver rises above the price of the legal-tender, that moment it becomes a commodity and goes out of the country, leaving us without change; and when it falls below legal-tender you defraud the laborer and reduce the value of the currency instead of appreciating it, for he can to-day buy more gold with the legal-tender than the silver. That is not all. We have had a remarkable spectacle within a month. I find from the statement of the Director of the Mint that a month ago our subsidiary silver coin was 3 per cent. and one mill below legal-tenders. In ten days it fell 1 per cent., and in those ten days we lost $160,000 on our stock of silver on hand. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] spoke a week ago it had risen 3 per cent. and one mill in three days. How did it so rise? I will tell you. Mr. Secretary Bristow, when silver touched that point, 4 per cent. below greenbacks, bought more than half a million in California, which is now arriving. As he was directed to buy silver, he no doubt acted wisely in buying when it was so low.

The British Parliament a few weeks ago passed a bill to pay the whole of the expenses of its Indian service in silver coin, and telegraphed to San Francisco for the silver, and they telegraphed back that they had sold it all to Mr. Bristow. There is no doubt but what they could have filled both orders. A few men in New York are able to bull the market in silver. They took advantage of this opportunity and will do it again; but there was nothing reliable or permanent in it. By telegraph we learn that last week it fell ½ per cent. lower than the lowest rate it had ever touched before. That was last Friday; and since then it has again risen three-fourths of 1 per cent., and thus stood yesterday at 103½ cents in gold per ounce sterling silver. This was worth $1.18 in greenbacks, would coin into $1.244 in our subsidiary silver, and taking 1 per cent. and one mill for coining, thus produced 5 per cent. more of subsidiary silver coin than the $1.18 that bought it, or is, in other words, worth that much less.

Now, sir, these are facts, and the proposition to issue this silver coin is not, in any conceivable sense, a step in the direction of specie

Now, sir, these are facts, and the proposition to issue this silver coin is not, in any conceivable sense, a step in the direction of specie resumption. However much we may differ on that subject, this subsidiary token business raises entirely different questions. It proposes disturbing the standard of value by issuing this coin that rises or falls in one or two hours or one or two days as many per cent. I want to warn the members of this House of this fact. It is proposed that we shall issue this silver coin which is bound to depreciate, which may fall 50 per cent. below par, and which we are thus asked to make a standard at the very moment it is for this reason rejected as a standard by every nation in Europe.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue in lieu of the $45,000,000 of fractional currency now in circulation an equal amount, if necessary, of this depreciated silver, and to sell the gold-bearing bonds of the United States to buy it. Others propose to amend so that the Secretary shall issue the fifteen millions he now has, but forbidding him from buying any more. Sir, do we want two standards of subsidiary coin? Are we to have fractional currency and silver mixed, or are we to reduce the volume of small change to one-third of what it is now? I say that this measure will lead to fearful confusion in the subsidiary currency of the country, and the moment our greenbacks fall 2 per cent. below this silver, our subsidiary coin becomes a commodity, it goes in a day, and we are left without change. I do not wish to consume the time of the House. I will not indicate for a moment that any undue influence has been brought to bear upon the House in favor of the passage of this bill in the interest of the silver mines in Nevada, but I rose simply to say to the House that this measure will inextricably confuse the currency of the country. It is no settlement of any question. It is no resumption of specie payments, and the argument that the clinking of silver will make our people desire the clinking of gold is simply preposterous as an argument. With less than thirteen millions of gold in the Treasury we might want it very badly before we could get it. It is certainly a very questionable kind of legislation, which is in itself confessedly injudicious, but which is to lead or force us to legislation that could not receive the assent of our deliberate judgment.

confessedly injudicious, but which is to lead or force us to legislation that could not receive the assent of our deliberate judgment.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the United States I believe is the only civilized nation that does not to-day have in circulation silver coin as a subsidiary currency. Even France, which is so often referred to as a model monetary nation, has, according to a late report, $160,000 of silver in circulation in that country.

We to-day, the American Congress, are debating the question whether we shall admit silver to constitute a part of our currency. It has been demonstrated here, after a most careful examination—and I understand the statement receives the unanimous assent of the Committee on Appropriations—that it is really cheaper and more economical for the United States to issue silver coin as a part of the subsidiary currency of the country than to print and issue fractional

As a matter of economy the committee have reported the bill to this House. It is opposed here by gentlemen who do not believe in a metallic currency of any kind. They look upon this as the first step, an insidious advance upon their theory that there is no necessity for a metallic currency and no necessity for a standard of value. They believe that you can do the business of the country on paper promises. It is not surprising, therefore, although it is demonstrated that it is cheaper and more economical to issue silver coin as a subsidiary currency than fractional currency, that they should oppose this bill.

It has been said in debate "standards are fixed, do not fluctuate, are not given to vicissitude, do not vary." Is it true that standards are fixed and do not fluctuate? Sir, there are no perfect invariable standards of length, space, quantity, time, or motion. All alike in this mutable, changing world are affected by surrounding circumstances. Heat expands the metal yard-stick and surveyor's chain; moisture swells woody fiber, and both affect textile fabrics. Shall the surveyor, therefore, discard his chain and use elastic India-rubber tape-lines?

The pendulum swings faster on a frosty morning and is tardy under summer heat. Shall we reject chronometers and measure time by the movements of the stars or the shadow of the sun? To have a measure movements of the stars or the shadow of the sun? To have a measure of time absolutely invariable, the length of the pendulum, the density of the air, and the resistance of friction science as well as observation tells us must remain the same. The pendulum's length must be adjusted to the mountain-height and to the sea-level. All that is claimed for the precious metals in this respect is that they are less variable, taking into account all the circumstances that affect value from one year to another and from one day to another, than paper promises are. I believe, sir, that we need a certain standard, and I believe that this bill is a step and a necessary economical step in that direc-

And here let me call attention to the fallacy of the arguments of some gentlemen whom I have heard on this floor in regard to paper money. My colleague from the La Salle district, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] speaking the other day in regard to the American system of finance, as he called it, recognized only that function of money which makes the bill of exchange, by the bank-check or any other species of paper promise to pay. He did not in his remarks, nor did the gentleman who followed in the same strain, recognize any other function of money, namely, to serve as a standard of value, for which purpose all civilized nations have adopted the precious metals.

The proposition of this bill is to issue in place of about $28,000,000 of fractional paper currency, in actual circulation, the coin that is already in the Mint of the United States. There are objections made which I will not now stop to answer, except to say, in regard to the argument presented that this coin will be drawn away from the country if the credit of the nation should depreciate, that we do not expect that the credit of the nation will depreciate. I do not think that as long as the administration of the Government is in the hands of the republican party they will permit the credit of the nation to depreciate, but it will continue to appreciate, even measured by the rate of interest, as it has appreciated for the last half dozen years, from over 6 per cent. in gold until now it is almost at 4 per cent., if not quite, as asserted the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley.] Neither do I believe that the country will permit the democratic party to assume the control of this Government unless the people shall be satisfied that the democratic party will not assail the honor and credit of the Government by attempting to undo what has been done by the republican party in advancing and appreciating the credit of the nation.

This question of supplying the country with the precious metals is not a new question. There is no theme more instructive, no subject more interesting, than to go back thirty or forty years and review the debates and discussions of the time when the old democratic party had the control of the Government. I wish I had time to read what was said by Jackson, and Benton, and Walker, and Levi Woodbury, and other men I might name, who were prominent in the discussions of the currency question growing out of the proposed re-charter of the Bank of the United States, prior to 1836. It was then said that the privilege of issuing small notes had driven the coin from the country. President Jackson not only recommended in his messages to Congress that the United States should discourage the issue of small notes by refusing to deposit the money of the Government in banks that issued bills of a denomination less than $5, but in his last annual message he said:

In the acts of several of the States prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of Congress at the last session forbidding their reception in payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced and a larger proportion of the precious metals infused into our circulation.—Gales & Seaton's Register, volume 13, part 1, page 634.

President Jackson recommended that the party itself should see to it that the several State Legislatures repealed all laws permitting the issue of small notes. Many of the States did repeal those laws, and in consequence it was claimed, and I believe the statistics showed it, that in 1836 the amount of specie in the country, according to the report of Mr. Woodbury, had increased from $25,000,000 in 1833 to $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 in 1836. This was claimed as one of the fruits of the withdrawal of small note sirely increased fixed in the description of the second constant. the withdrawal of small-note circulation and efforts to accumulate

The proposition for the suppression of small notes received the sanction of the most illustrious names in English financial legislation— Peel, Canning, Brougham, Huskisson, Liverpool, and Wellington.
In the parliamentary debate in 1828 the chancellor of the exchequer

There was a natural antipathy between the one-pound note and the guinea. They would not exist together, for the note soon drove the sovereign out of circulation.

The Duke of Wellington said:

The experience of the last few years had proved that one-pound notes and gold overeigns would not circulate at the same time.

Mr. Huskisson said:

When the paper is let in the gold will disappear. They might vote the money, they might coin it, but how could they retain it in the country?

Such is the invariable rule. You recollect the remark that is attrib-uted to Edmund Burke, in a letter he wrote to Mr. Canning in 1797, when it was proposed to allow the Bank of England to issue notes of a denomination less than £5, or $25. He said:

Tell Mr. Pitt that if he consents to the issue of £1 notes he will never see a guinea

As a matter of fact it was some twenty-five or thirty years before

As a matter of fact it was some twenty-five or thirty years before guineas were again in circulation in England.

And it has been so in this country, and will be again. As long as by our laws we prevent the issue of silver coin for circulation and authorize the issue of fractional paper currency, silver will not circulate. Withdraw the fractional paper currency and, whether it be cheaper or dearer, the silver must come in here. We raise from our mines almost $40,000,000 a year, which flows through our country, a steady stream, from which we are unable to draw even a portion for our own use as a circulating medium. But even if we were destinted our own use as a circulating medium. But even if we were destitute of silver, the discontinuance of the issue of fractional paper currency would soon supply an abundance of silver currency provided the Government will permit its coinage.

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I propose to submit some remarks upon the bill which is now pending before this committee, and if I can have the attention of the committee I think I can demonstrate that the bill as a whole ought not to pass. While I have no objection to the first section of the bill, as to the second section I conceive that it is unnecessary as well as impolitic. Unnecessary, because it is already the existing law; impolitic, because the democratic party has no interest in shouldering the financial blunders of those upon the opposite side of the House. If disaster should hang upon the heels our financial policy, let the fault lie at the doors of those who are the authors of the system.

Without further remarks upon that subject, I would state as a proposition that our fractional silver currency now on hand should be issued, but not for the purpose of redeeming any portion of our fractional paper currency. If I can have the attention of this committee tional paper currency. If I can have the attention of this committee for a few minutes I think I can demonstrate the truth of the proposition which I have submitted. We have now already in the mints of the United States about $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 of fractional silver currency. Let that be issued, but let not the fractional paper currency be redeemed through the operation of law. If there should be a redundancy of the fractional currency, the silver coin and the fractional paper currency combined, then, the fractional currency being redeemable in legal-tenders, the excess would be disposed of in that way. If there should not be enough of fractional currency, then legal-tenders could be exchanged for the deficiency. If the fractional silver currency should be unnecessary or should go to the payment of either a home or a foreign debt, it would answer the purpose of gold to that extent, and would not prejudice the interests of the country. So much upon that point.

I have another suggestion to make in relation to it, one which I think will more thoroughly demonstrate the impropriety of the passage of the second section of this bill. First, it is cheaper to the Government of the United States to arrest the execution of what is called the fractional-silver clause of the act of January 14, 1875. A few figures which I present will verify what I have to say. The fractional currency reported by the Treasurer of the United States in his report to Congress in December, 1874, amounted to $45,880,000. Fine silver bullion yields 12 per cent. in coinage, according to the last report of the superintendent of the Mint. Hence it would take about $37,000,000 in gold bonds to buy sufficient silver bullion to make the necessary coinage. Deduct the amount of bullion already purchased, $12,658,000, from $37,000,000, the required silver bullion, and it would leave a balfrom $37,000,000, the required silver bullion, and it would leave a balance of $24,000,000 of bullion at gold value to be yet purchased. The interest of this $24,000,000, payable quarterly, would amount to 6 per cent., which would equal $1,440,000 in gold. This, converted into legal-tenders, would give a premium of $75,000; so that the interest and the premium would yield $1,515,000 in legal-tenders. That would be the annual cost of the bonds yet to be purchased to execute the law of January 14, 1875, in its relation to the fractional currency. Upon the other hand, the expenses for the manufacture of fractional currency as reported by the Committee on Appropriations amount to $1,100,000, which, taken from $1,515,000, would leave a balance of $415,000 annually in favor of the fractional currency.

But, in addition to that, I maintain that the fractional currency may

But, in addition to that, I maintain that the fractional currency may be engraved and printed much more cheaply than at an expense of

Upon a partial examination which I have madé into this subject, I find that a large proportion—supposed to be about 60 per cent.—of the fractional currency is returned to the Treasury of the cent.—of the fractional currency is returned to the Treasury of the United States which might remain on issue; and the average life of our fractional currency ought to be at least two years instead of fifteen months, as it is now reported. That being the case, there should be a diminution in the cost of the fractional currency perhaps to the extent of 25 per cent. In addition to that, I am satisfied that the amount paid in the different chemical processes for the execution of that currency is too great, and that there should be a diminution in that respect to the contract of the cont After making a net calculation as nearly as I could approximate the truth, I have come to the conclusion that this fractional currency ought to be prepared at an annual expense of $300,000, which, deducted from $1.515,000, leaves an advantage of $715,000 in favor of the fractional currency over the plan of selling bonds for the purpose of procuring silver bullion to execute the law. This amount is a consideration which ought to have its weight with those who have to vote upon this subject.

But independently of that, Mr. Chairman, there is another consideration to which I wish to call the attention of this House. If the cost of the fractional currency were equal to that of the coinage of fractional silver, it is to be considered that we furnish home labor in the preparation of the fractional currency on the one hand, and upon other we sell gold bonds, the interest of which goes to feed the foreign vampires that are sucking the blood from the American nation.

To bring the matter home. We have recently seen about fifteen hundred employés turned out from the Bureau of Printing and Engraving in midwinter, poor and shelterless, under the operation of that law: famine and disease are now pictured on the shriveled cheeks of some of those poor unfortunates. If discrimination is to be made at all, let the Government of the United States feed its own labor, take care of its own helpless dependents; let it not be throwing bait after bait to the European cormorants that are swallowing up the labor and sapping the foundation of our own Government.

Something has been said about General Jackson and the democratic party. Every one of the men of that party at the time referred to denounced a national debt as a national curse; and it is not to be found upon the record that even Madison or Jackson or Adams, if you please, ever advocated a foreign debt to relieve the necessities of the Government in a time of peace or administer your financial system. They were wise, and advocated the doctrine of Mr. Benton that if you wish to reach specie resumption it must arise out of the prospentry of the nation, and not by plunging the nation deeper in debt for the purpose of reaching a supposed end. Such a financial system would not only disturb the finances proper, but would derange the whole system of your revenue laws and come down with a nighty pressure of taxation upon the bone and the sinew of the laboring masses who support the Government and who constitute its pride in peace and bulwarks in war.

Mr. Chairman, I say let the appropriation provided for in the first section of the bill be speedily made. Let the suffering employes be recalled and put to their wonted labor. But when they return, let them remember that it was not the democratic party which aimed the blow to strike down the system of fractional currency, to deprive them of employment, and to sell gold bonds in Europe and oppress the people with taxation to pay the interest.

Mr. Chairman, I have only to say in conclusion that I regret that I cannot support the second section of the bill. I think it ought to be stricken out, and a section inserted providing simply for repealing and arresting the excution of the first section of the act of January 14, 1875.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I-shall support this bill, first, because it is a movement toward the resumption of specie payments to the extent of the fractional currency it proposes to substitute. The subsidiary silver coin is one of the species of money known to the Constitution and recognized in the commercial world. Secondly, on the ground of economy. It now costs the Government annually in round numbers $1,400,000 to keep the fractional currency afloat.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is of the opinion that that estimate is too large, and has the estimate of one or two banknote companies fixing the amount for manufacturing the same at about $1,000,000. It necessarily costs the Government more to manufacturing the saine at about $1,000,000. It necessarily costs the Government more to manufacture it than it could be done by private enterprise. Besides, the gentleman omits a large item of expense to the Government; I refer to the large force required at the Treasury, sub-treasuries, and depositories of the Government to annually pay out, receive, count, and destroy the fractional currency and to keep the necessary accounts connected therewith.

The committee fully investigated the subject, had before them the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer, the Superintendent of the currency printing, and others, and there can be no question that the expense to the Government is fully equal to the amount named,

$1,400,000.

The estimated amount of fractional currency in use is about $28,000,000; suppose it be set down at $30,000,000.

We have now coined and silver on hand to be coined sufficient to issue $18,000,000 of the subsidiary silver coin—to make, say, $12,000,000 more would require the purchase of about $10,000,000 of silver bullion. Should 5 per cent. bonds to that amount be issued therefor, the interest thereon would be $500,000. No one supposes that the silver coin on hand would be sold; it would, doubtless, lie idle in the rults of the Treasury if not substituted for fractional currency. The result then, in an economic view, is the difference between the cost now to the Government, $1,400,000, and the interest on, say, $10,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds, $500,000; leaving an annual gain to the Government of $900,000.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewirt,] it seems to me, indulged more in fancy than fact when he expressed his fears that the poorer classes would be detrimentally affected by the issue of the sub-York) hold the sum of $315,000,000 deposits, and if the whole sum, $315,000,000, should be withdrawn in sums of $5 or less, paid in silver, the loss to the depositors would amount to over $15,000,000. Now, it is manifest that this suggestion is purely imaginary, as out of the $30,000,000 to be put affoat throughout the United States the savings-banks of New York would get hold of a mere trifling amount. Besides, I think it would be difficult to persuade the poor man that $5 in silver would not be as desirable to him as so much fractional currency.

Let us go this far toward constitutional money. The republican party conceived and brought forth what they are now pleased to designate as the rag-baby; they forced the illegitimate bantling upon the country against the protest and remonstrance of the democratic party; and in order to prolong and perpetuate its existence, they resorted to the reprehensible means of re-organizing and packing the Supreme Court of the United States that they might overturn its well-considered judgment that the bantling was illegitimate, unconstitutional, and not a legal tender for money. It is now very unkind, very unnatural, for that party to repudiate their offspring, and to attempt to quarter it upon the democratic household.

I regret to see a few of my democratic friends disposed to foster the bantling, and to give it their countenance and support. I trust upon reflection they will see the propriety of leaving it severely alone and entirely in the charge and management of its own paternal household.

Having forced it upon the country, and thereby engendered the wild and reckless trade and speculation which collapsed into the late panic and disturbance, bringing in the want and distress which now pervades the country, the republican party alone should be held responsible for the results. If they had been willing to let the judgment of the Supreme Court as pronounced by Chief Justice Chase and his four able associates (five against three) stand in force, as it should have been allowed to stand, being undoubtedly the correct in-terpretation of the Constitution and of the power of Congress upon the subject, the disturbed condition of the country would not have had an existence.

The resumption of specie payments would have followed directly upon that decision as a matter of course; the great railroad corporations of the country, with their thousand of millions of indebtedrations of the country, with their thousand of millions of indebtedness, with the other millionaire debtors, would have been obliged to meet their engagements upon a specie basis. The greenback issue would have had only the value which its convertibility into specie would have given it. Business and trade would have been conducted on a sound specie basis, and the wild schemes, reckless adventures, overtrading, and extravagance which followed the overturn of that desiring would have been recovered.

decision would have been prevented.

But the republican party, with the present Executive at its head, (now professedly so clamorous for resumption,) yielded to the power and influence of the great railroad corporations; and, as soon as it was ascertained what the decision of the court would be, an act was hurried through Congress, by virtue of which one judge was pensioned off the bench and another additional judgeship was created, giving the present Executive the appointment of two new judges. He had no difficulty in finding men of the needful inflation ideas, with convictions to the end desired; they were readily supplied by the two powerful railroad corporations of the country, one from the Pennsylvania Company and the other from the Camden and Amboy Company; their nominations were confirmed by a republican Senate with pany; their nominations were confirmed by a republican Senate with becoming expedition; and thus a majority of one in favor of sustaining the rag-baby and of overturning the well-considered and solemn decision of the court, which had been pronounced by Chief Justice Chase and his four able associates was obtained. And by this republican legislation and executive management the solemn judgment of the Supreme Court, which by a vote of 5 to 3 judges had pronounced the rag-baby illegitimate, was by a vote of 5 to 4 judges overruled, and the bantling declared legitimate.

To show the interest which those railroads had in overturning that

To show the interest which those railroads had in overturning that decision, I send up to have read copies of the undertakings of two of those companies with the holders of coupons against them:

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorandum.

Mr. — has this day presented to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company — coupons, due April 1, 1870, of the second-mortgage bonds of the said company and has demanded payment thereof in gold or its equivalent, and the nominal amount of said coupons has been paid to the said holder by the said company in United States legal-tender notes, without prejudicing his right to recover the difference between the said nominal sum and the currency value of a like sum in gold upon the 1st day of April, 1870, which difference the said company agree to pay in legal-tender notes to the said holder, with interest from date hereof, upon the 1st of April, 1871, upon surrengler of this memorandum, unless in the mean time it shail be decided by the Suprefile Court of the United States that debts contracted prior to the 25th of February, 1862, may be discharged in legal-tender notes of the United States; in which event no obligation to pay shall arise under this memorandum: It being expressly agreed, however, that in case the Supreme Court of the United States shall within one year from the 1st day of April, 1870, decide that debts contracted in lawful money of the United States before the 25th of February, 1862, must be paid in gold, the said company will within twenty days from the rendering of such decision pay the said holder, upon the surrender of this memorandum, the aforesaid difference in legal-tender notes, with interest.

[SEAL.]

Resolution as to payment of interest.

Extract from the minutes of the joint board of directors of the United Canal and Railroad Companies of New Jersey, held at Trenton, February 26, 1870.

"Resolved, That the treasurers of the united companies be directed to pay the interest coupons on bonds issued prior to February 25, 1862, and other obligations created prior to that time in the usual currency of the country as heretofore, but to notify the parties interested that the difference between the value of said currency and of gold at the time of payment will be hereafter paid by the companies should the right to require the same become the settled law of the land.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. It is said that these undertakings were prepared by the respective counsel of those two companies, who were afterward appointed judges, and made two of the number who gave the overruling decision.

It is not my purpose nor do I wish to be understood as impugning the integrity of the judges referred to. We have a right to believe that their opinions were expressed from honest convictions, but those convictions were well known prior to their appointment, and we may be well assured that had they not entertained such convictions they would not have been appointed.

The reprehensible part of the transaction was, that the party in power set to work and by legislative and executive contrivance and management re-organized, changed, and packed the Supreme Court in order to secure a decision to sustain their greenback issue against the solemn prior judgment of the court, against the plain import of the Constitution, and against the almost universal judgment and the Constitution, and against the almost universal judgment and opinion of the legal, judicial, and intelligent men of the country.

We are now reaping the harvest of derangement and distress which that reprehensible management brought forth.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment there is but one direct way out of the entanglement in which the country is placed, and that is by an unqualified repeal of the legal-tender enactment, as applied to all contracts made prior to its enactment or which may be made in the future, and by making the greenback issue receivable for all debts, duties, and taxes to the Government. Let the Government, with the great railroad corporations the banks, and other millionaire debtors. great railroad corporations, the banks, and other millionaire debtors meet their engagements on a specie basis—the only money known to the civilized world—and business will soon revive upon a stable foundation and all will be well.

The pretended resumption bill which, under the party lash and without due consideration, was rushed through during the closing hours of the last Congress and became a law against the vote of every democrat in each branch of Congress, is nothing but a hollow sham, a perfect abortion.

The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,] who discoursed for a whole hour a few days since on the subject, while he totally avoided, any models are the subject, while he totally avoided. with the craft of a politician, to announce or recommend any mode for resumption, was obliged to admit the futility of the bogus measure which he aided largely to enact. He said:

The act providing for resumption in 1879 requires, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, some additional legislation to make it practical and effective. As it stands it fixes a date, but gives no adequate process: and the paramount duty of Congress is to provide a process.—Congressional Record, February 11, page 19.

Now, with this forced admission—because it is only the declaration of the whole country—we had a right to expect that the great leader of his party and prominent candidate for presidential honors would have announced a policy, a plan for resumption. But see how wisely a politician can talk and commit himself to nothing! In the same paragraph he goes on to say:

paragraph he goes on to say:

And in all legislation looking to that end it must be borne in mind that unless we move in harmony with the great business interests of the country we shall assuredly fail. Specie payments can only be brought about by wise and well-considered legislation based on the experience of other nations, embodying the matured wisdom of the country, healthfully promoting all legitimate business, and carefully avoiding everything that may tend to create fear and distrust among the people. In other words, what we most need as the outgrowth of legislation is confidence, public and private, general and individual. To-day we are suffering from the timidity of capital, and so long as the era of doubt and uncertainty prevails that timidity will continue and increase. Steps toward inflation will make it chronic; unwise steps toward resumption will not remove it. We shall have discharged our full duty in Congress if we can mature a measure which will steadily advance our currency to the specie standard, and at the same time work in harmony with the reviving industries and great commercial wants of the country.

Words! words! So far as any plan or policy for resumption is concerned, they are nought but sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am no candidate for President, and can therefore afford to express an opinion and am at liberty to give a plan, whether it be good, bad, or indifferent.

My plan is to take away the enforced character of Uncle Sam's notes, and let him, like you and I and every other citizen when he gives his notes to pay money on demand, be compelled to do so, and also be compelled to take his own notes in payment of all dues to

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few reflections on this bill, and to say at the outset there are but two points for this House to determine in order to decide whether they will pass or reject the bill. The first is its relation to economy in expenditure. We are confronted with the fact that the appropriation for printing the fractional currency has run out, and are now called upon to appropriate $418,000 to keep up the work for the remainder of the fiscal year. The Committee on Appropriations find, if we issue the silver we have on hand and proceed to substitute silver for paper fractional currency as far and as fast as we can, we shall need but $163,000 to be now appropriated to eke out the supply of the paper fractional currency while the substitution is taking place. If we do not, if the silver portion of this bill is rejected, we must appropriate just $225,000 more than the amount proposed in this bill. We must take it in hand at once and determine whether we will turn back from the silrer policy of the Government and at once appropriate a quarter of a million more to print paper scrip, or go on with the silver resumption and save immediately in this bill a quarter of a million of dollars.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a ques-

Mr. GARFIELD. Excuse me; I cannot yield.
Mr. KELLEY. What amount will we have to report in support of mints to coin silver if substituted for this paper?
Mr. GARFIELD. If I had time I would gladly yield. The other point is the relation of this bill to the general question of the resumption of specie payments. These are the two principles involved.
But before I come directly to the merits of the two points, I wish to call attention for a few moments to some of the criticisms rule on this call attention for a few moments to some of the criticisms made on this call attention for a few moments to some or the criticisms made on this bill. First, to my great amazement, is the charge made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] in his speech that the Director of the Mint had done a disgraceful thing, which ought to make the cheek of every man redden with shame, because he had put into his annual report a statement of the condition of the great silver mine I will quote the language of the gentleman, so I may of this country. do him no injustice:

Turn to the report of the Director of the Mint; it is little more than an advertisement of old Townsend's genuine sarsaparilla. [Laughter.] It is a pamphlet molded upon the advertising pamphlets of that physician, whose sands of life are nearly run. Pages of it are covered with evidence of the increasing value of the stock of the mines on the Comstock lode, and its bulk is swollen so that it is inconvenient for carriage by the insertion of maps of mines and their machinery, intended to demonstrate the truth of his advice to the people that if they want to buy stock in the Comstock mines they better do it at once. [Laughter.]

I will say in response to that, what my friend from Pennsylvania ought to have known, that we have for years annually appropriated $10,000 to $15,000 to secure statistics of the precious metals, and nearly two years ago that particular work was placed under the control of the Director of the Mint by the Secretary of the Treasury. I will print his letter of July 3, 1874, by which it is made the duty of the Director of the Mint to see to this business of collecting statistics of the precious metals:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., July 3, 1874.

Sir: The collection of statistics of mines and mining, for the continuation of which there is an appropriation of $10,000, is hereby devolved upon your office, and you are anthorized and instructed to take such action as will in your most efficiently and economically attain the object of the appropriation above referred to. Very respectfully,

CHAS. F. CONANT, Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

H. R. LINDERMAN, Esq., Director of the Mint.

He was obeying the laws of the United States and the order of his a statesman finding fault because his Government, or the officers of it, were doing what they could to ascertain the facts concerning the greatest silver mine this world has ever known? Who else but a man who had a scheme to further, or a special policy to carry out, which policy came into collision with so great a fact as this great silver mine, would have found fault because the Government was as-certaining what its character was? Why, sir, I hold in my hand copies of official letters from the French government in which the great finance minister Léon Say, details an officer to be sent over to the United States with instructions to go in person and examine these silver mines and make thorough report, so they may show what this great new American silver product is, and what its effect is likely to be upon the money of the world.

Shall we, then, in the American Congress attack our own Government for taking such means at a less expense to ascertain our own silver product? I will print these papers as a part of my remarks.

Letter from Léon Say to Colonel Jules Berton.

PARIS, January 31, 1876.

SIR: I thank you for the general information with which you have furnished me relating to the production of precious metals in the United States.

I have authorized Mr. Ruan, director of the French mint, to enter into correspondence with you, and ask for reports upon everything which appertains to the monetary question, as well as circulation, in the United States, and more particularly to the production of mines.

I hope that the relation which will be established between you and the mint of France will enable us to prosecute with usefulness the studies we have undertaken, in order to prepare us to revise the monetary convention concluded in 1865 with a certain number of powers, which convention expires in 1880.

I beg you to receive the assurance of my sentiments of high consideration.

Very respectfully,

Minister of Finance,

Paris, February 1, 1876

PARIS, February 1, 1876.

SIR: In conformity with instructions that have been transmitted to me by the minister of finance, and of which you are cognizant, I beg to request you to transmit to me reports upon everything appertaining to the monetary questions and circulations in the United States, and more particularly upon the production of mines. The following are the principal points to which for the present I call your attention:

First. Monetary question in the United States. Ways and means proposed to prepare the resumption of specie payments within the fixed period of three years. Statistics of the national banks and other financial establishments. Amount of the issue of greenbacks and other paper moneys.

Second. Organization and administration of the United States Mint. Statistics of the coinage. Circulation of gold and silver coin, and what is the special importance of the coinage of the trade-dollar and its use.

Third. Production of gold, silver, and quicksilver in the Pacific States, and more particularly in California and Nevada.

Fourth. To point out the leading silver mines now being worked on the great Comstock Lode in Nevada, and the importance of the auriferous lands and grants of California.

Fifth. Valuation of the production demostic consumption and exportation of consider Lode in Nevaca, and the importance of the autherous lands and grants of California.

Fifth. Valuation of the production, domestic consumption, and exportation of precious metals. recious metals.

I shall avail myself of the opportunity of asking you for such other information is will complete the points above indicated.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my sentiments of high consideration.

I. RUAN,

Director of the Mint.

Colonel JULES BERTON.

[Translation.]

PARIS, January 29, 1876.

PARIS, January 29, 1876.

My Dear Sir and Colleague: I take the liberty of introducing to you Colonel Jules Berton, ex-vice-consul of France in California, and actual president of the London and Pacific Coast Mining Bureau.

The French administration has the greatest desire to be enlightened upon various questions connected with the monetary organization in the United States, as well as the production of precious metals and quicksilver in the Pacific States.

I will be very grateful to you for whatever you can do in order to enable Mr. Berton to fulfill with usefulness the mission with which he is intrusted by the French administration.

I thank you, therefore, beforehand for the reception you will kindly extend to Mr. Berton. Rest assured, sir, that for my part I will seize with eagerness the opportunity of making myself agreeable to you.

Accept, my dear sir and colleague, the expression of my sentiments of high consideration.

L. RUAN,

L. RUAN, Director of the French Mint.

Dr. Linderman,
Director-General of the United States Mint, Washington.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, next to notice some criticisms on this bill by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt.] When he first started out in his speech he said:

For one, I here declare my readiness and my intention not to permit any party traumels or any fear of the political consequences to interfere with my duty in this respect, and I here state that I am quite ready to advocate any policy, wherever it may originate, which will bring us back to the only sure ground of a specie basis.

I thoroughly agreed with him, and expected to hear a good business speech from a business stand-point. But before he had gone a bow-shot from his introduction he began to say this measure is a repubsnot from his introduction he began to say this measure is a republican, not a democratic, measure, and appealed to his democratic associates not to bolster up by their indorsement a republican measure, which, if unaided, may fail and disgrace the party that originated it. And all through the speech I was impressed with this thought: that, rather than that a republican measure should prove successful, he would see it fail in order that the republican party might not get any credit for it. For example, he said:

credit for it. For example, he said:

But the existing laws regulating the finances of the country are essentially in execution of the policy of the republicans, and will be discussed as such. The act of January 14, 1875, "to provide for the resumption of specie payments" on the 1st of January, 1879, was agreed upon by a caucus of republican Senators, and made a party measure both in the Senate and the House of Representatives, the democrats generally voting and many of the leaders of the democratic party speaking against it. It was, therefore, a republican, and not a democratic party speaking against it. It was, therefore, a republican, and not a democratic party speaking against or in part, the failure of this act to produce any beneficial results to the suffering business of the country, its tendency to aggravate the evils under which the people are groaning, and the want of statesmanship apparent in the framing of legislation confessedly powerless for good unless supplemented by further legislation are chargeable to the republican party, and the republican party alone.

This is not my ideal of particits statesmanship. I do not besitate.

This is not my ideal of patriotic statesmanship. I do not hesitate to say that if the majority of this House propose a measure which will bring prosperity to this country and restore the ancient standard of values I will go with them heart and soul if the measure would give you a quarter of a million of votes. I am amazed that men should stand up here on great questions of this sort and make it a matter of first inquiry which party may be helped or hurt by it.

I pass from that consideration to another criticism. My friend from

New York says that the only reason why there is any possibility of issuing this silver successfully is not because of the wisdom of the republican party, but because of a streak of good luck they have had. He says that they have stumbled upon two items of good luck: the discovery of the great Bonanza mines and the demonstration of silver in Germany. Let me ask my friend if he has carefully read the history of this matter? I turn to the Congressional Record and read a paragraph or two from the speech of my friend Senator Sherman on the 22d of December, 1874, when the resumption bill was reported.

The first section of the bill provides for the resumption of specie payments on the fractional currency. It is confined to that subject alone. It so happens that at this particular period of time the state of the money market, the state of the demand for silver bullion, and more especially the recent action of the German Empire, which has demonetized silver and thus cheapened that product, enables us now, without any loss of revenue, without any sacrifice, to enter the market for the purchase of bullion and resume specie payments on our fractional currency.

He then goes on to say that our fractional currency and subsidiary ilver are now almost on a level of value. - There was no luck about The demonetization of silver in Germany had happened two years before that time. The Bonanza mines had been discovered long before. It was a plain matter of fact, well known at the time and announced by the author of the bill. Where is the luck?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. How was it six weeks afterward?

Mr. GARFIELD. As a matter of course fluctuations followed, which it was easily foreseen might follow. But I have quoted those remarks by Senator Supply to show my friend from New York it.

remarks by Senator Sherman to show my friend from New York it was not a matter of mere blind luck as he stated.

Now I call attention, in the next place, to what seems to be the Malakoff of my friends on the other side, especially the gentleman from New York, namely, the question of economy; and in this I observe that there is another bonanza besides silver. The gentleman from New York asks for bids from a couple of corporations to see whether he cannot get the work done cheaper than it is being done in the Treasury, and these two bids are printed in his speech; one bank-note company saying they can do the work for a round million of dollars; the other saying they can do the work for a round minton of dollars; the other saying they can do it for perhaps $950,000; and then he attempts to show we are paying $1,410,000 to do that work. To do what work? The work of the gentleman's two bank-note companies? By no means. Did the gentleman suppose that the companies? By no means. Dut the general suppose that the printing and engraving of these notes was the whole cost of the fractional currency? By no means. What more? We have a great Bureau in the Treasury where these notes have to be counted, recounted, and counted again. We have a bureau in New York to gather up these very fractional notes, and twelve men are in the emgather up these very fractional notes, and twelve men are in the employ of the United States for the sole purpose of sorting, counting, and returning to the Treasury the filthy, worn-out fractional currency. We have eight more men in Boston for that purpose; five or six more in Cincinnati; and in all the sub-treasuries of the United States we keep a force of men employed on this very business of the fractional currency. But what is the $1,410,000 of which the gentleman from New York speaks? I have here an official paper from the Treasury Department which gives $1,082,521 as the expense incurred last year by the Bureau to do the engraving and printing, we furnish-Treasury Department which gives $1,082,521 as the expense incurred last year by the Bureau to do the engraving and printing, we furnishing the paper, not the paper of commerce on which the bank-note companies would print, but our distinctive paper, which is a safe-guard against counterfeiting, and more expensive than that of those bank-note companies. The gentleman will find on a full examination of the facts that the work is done cheaper in the Treasury than the gentleman's bank-note companies do it. Then there is the expense incurred for counters in the currency division, $60,000; $65,000 for the same purpose in the Register's Office; $181,000 in the Treasurer's Office; and the expense of express charges of fractional cururer's Office; and the expense of express charges of fractional currency to and from the Treasurer's Office $20,000 more. I submit a letter from the Treasury Department showing the items of cost in the

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Bureau of Engraving and Printing, March 20, 1876.

SIR: I inclose, by direction of Mr. Conant, a statement, as requested by you, showing the amount in sheets and values and the cost of fractional currency printed and delivered by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing from July 1, 1869, to June 30, 1875, giving the amount for each fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

HENRY A. JEWELL, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. James A. Garfield, House of Representatives.

Statement of the expense of preparing, issuing, and redeeming the fractional currency of the United States for the fiscal year 1875.

Expense incurred by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, (as per letter herewith).

Expense incurred by the currency division, Secretary's Office, (see letter herewith).

Expense incurred by the Register's Office, (see letter herewith)...

Expense incurred by the United States Treasurer's Office.....

Expense of express charges of fractional currency to and from Treasurer's Office. 60 660 00 65, 770 00 181, 644 00 20, 151 75

So that nearly a million and a half of the charge that this paper So that nearly a million and a half of the charge that this paper money cost us is not for printing and engraving, but for handling, which would necessarily be done if the bank-note companies had the work. Therefore, on the score of economy the gentleman has mistaken wholly and totally the elements of the problem. If the gentleman wants to go back and give this work to the company that manufactured notes for the southern confederacy, he cannot sustain his position on the score of economy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, take another view of this question. Do gentlemen of the House know what we have paid out for the printing of fractional currency? Do they know how much has been issued? I will tell them. The whole amount issued up to the 30th of June, 1875, amounts to the enormous aggregate of $340,348,179.40.

I copy from the public-debt statement the amount of fractional currency outstanding by the end of June in each year since 1864:

June 14, 1864, fractional	currency	$21, 031, 948	85
June 30, 1865, fractional	currency	25, 005, 828	76

June 30, 1867, fractional	currency	28, 307, 523	52
June 30, 1868, fractional	currency	32, 626, 951	75

June 30, 1875, fractional currency
A verage outstanding for twelve years $35,000,000	- A - A - A - A - A - A - A - A - A - A

This table shows that the average outstanding amount during the last twelve years has been about thirty-five millions, and the amount outstanding on the first day of the present month was $45,124,134.47.

I had also a table compiled from the official records showing the face value of the fractional currency issued each year since 1869 and its cost of printing and engraving.

Cost of fractional currency.

Fiscal year.	Number of sheets de- livered.	Face value.	Cost.
1869-'70	8, 577, 996 7, 904, 100 9, 637, 900 11, 478, 300 11, 964, 500 12, 988, 000	$31, 209, 716 31, 103, 900 31, 816, 900 38, 674, 800 38, 927, 900 36, 612, 800	$926, 072 36 712, 074 19 931, 527 55 1, 159, 289 69 917, 664 32 1, 083, 521 20
Total	62, 550, 996	208, 346, 016	5, 730, 149 31
Average per annum	10, 425, 166	34, 724, 336	955, 024 90

This table shows that during the last six years the average amount issued has been over thirty-four millions a year of face value and the average cost has been $955,024.90 per year. This of course does not include the cost of assorting, counting, and redeeming. Could we estimate the expense of assorting and counting at the various subtreasuries, it would swell the annual cost considerably more than a million and a half per year.

Altogether it costs us very nearly $2,000,000 a year to keep up our fractional currency. Now, if we issue silver in place of this fractional currency it will stay out forty or fifty years without renewal and after one issue it will be half a century before we shall be called upon to replace it at all except in case of actual loss. The gentleman refuses to give up a currency which must be renewed every ten months; we propose a currency that need not be renewed for half a century. He refuses to abandon a currency that costs nearly $2,000,000 a year; we propose a currency which cost us but one-fiftieth of that after the cost of the first issue is borne.

Therefore, for the purpose of economy, we should pass the bill as reported by the committee.

But in the second place the gentleman says that this bill will rob the poor man. I will quote a paragraph from his speech:

And who, Mr. Speaker, will be robbed and who will get the benefit of the fraud? The fractional currency is essentially the poor man's money. The bulk of it at any one time is in the actual possession of the laboring-classes of this country. If you take away from them what is worth eighty-seven and one-half cents in gold and replace it with what is worth only eighty-two and five-eighths cents, you rob the working-classes of nearly 5 per cent., five cents out of every dollar of their scanty possessions. No human device can ever prevent debased money from falling to its true value as compared with other commodities. The dollar may be still called a dollar, but the adulteration not apparent on its face will betray itself in the increased price of every commodity which the poor man's family consumes.

Mr. Chairman, did any body ever before hear that one-half a dollar stamped on a piece of silver, stamped with the Government stamp, is not to be more relied upon than a piece of paper with fifty cents printed on it? By what logic, by what possible feat of intellect, can a man confront a proposition of that sort and not absolutely burst forth in laughter at the absurdity of his own conception? Cheat the laboring-man! Does not my friend know that this question of the relation of silver coin to gold coin is two hundred years old? Two hundred years ago all the intelligence that Newton and Locke could bring to bear upon this subject resulted in proving the impossibility of sustaining in equipose two standards of value, the one silver and the other gold-

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. PAGE. I am now entitled to the floor, and will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very much obliged to my friend from Cal-

The attempt was made to keep up two standards of value, one of gold, one of silver, and it was found utterly impossible, because the value of the two metals fluctuated in the market, and finally, after a thorough discussion of the whole subject, it was found impos sible to keep up a double standard. Some nations took silver as their standard of value and some took gold; but almost all nations have adopted one metal for their standard coin and another metal for a subsidiary coinage for the sake of change. Most nations have adopted gold as the standard of value and silver as a subsidiary currency. Why? They cannot so well divide gold as silver for small coin. The case is well stated by a recent author:

There is no law, statute or common, which gives any private person, company, or institution the right to take silver to the mint and demand coin in exchange. Thus it is left in the hands of the Treasury and the mint to issue so much and such denominations of silver coins as they may think needful for the public service. This state of the law is perfectly right, because, as the silver coins are tokens they cannot be got rid of by melting or exportation at their nominal values. If individuals were free to demand as much silver coin as they liked a surplus might be thrown into circulation in years of brisk trade which in a subsequent year of depressed trade would lie upon people's hands.

The United States has also adopted this wise policy, and our silver coin is to-day under our laws more valuable than that of any other nation. Here is a table showing the relative valuation of the subnation. sidiary silver coinage of different nations:

Legal ratios of value of gold to silver.
United States	14.95	to	1
Great Britain	14. 2	to	1
France	13. 2	to	1
Germany
Latin states Coinage Union*	13, 2	to	1
Scandinavian states Coinage Union	14 8	to	1

The United States silver coinage is a little more valuable and it has more silver in it than the silver coinage of the other countries named.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] must make his attack against England and against all the countries of the world which follow the wise practice of the last two hundred years if he raises the question as an injury to the poor man.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will it always retain that relative

Mr. GARFIELD. We can always keep our silver coin in proper relation to gold.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will you redeem it in gold?
Mr. GARFIELD. It is a legal tender for the payment of debts up to $5. For all ordinary purposes of change it does exactly what a gold dollar would do.

The wisdom of the last two hundred years have taught the nations that this is the wisest thing to do.

The only possible danger I can see in this measure is that, should Conress so behave as to depreciate the value of greenbacks until gold should reach a premium of 120, the silver might become more valuable than the greenbacks and be driven out of circulation. But I remind gentlemen of the fact that, notwithstanding all this fluctuation, the premium on gold has not been so high as 120 since 1871, and we ought to have enough faith in ourselves and enough determination that we will not permit such unwise legislation as to make this bill dangerous in that respect. Our friend from New York finally says that this will be no step forward toward specie payments. He seems to prefer paper for our fractional currency. I do not know that my friend means to stand by that; but his language seems to imply that he wants us to resume in gold, and have a paper fractional currency.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I meant just the opposite.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope he did mean it, but he did not say the opposite.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I certainly did say it.

Mr. GARFIELD. In order to do the gentleman no injustice, I quote in full what he did say, and it is as follows:

But I deny that the substitution of subsidiary silver coin for the fractional currency has anything to do with the resumption of specie payments. It is the substitution of metallic tokens for paper ones. The only specie resumption known to the law or to the great commercial nations is resumption in gold. For minor coins, copper, nickel, silver, or paper may be used; and their purchasing power, whenever they may be in excess of the demand, will be measured by what they will produce in gold. duce in gold.

The remainder of what I desire to say is to this point: will this measure be a step toward the resumption of specie payments? If not, then I am opposed to it, however economical it might be. If it is a fair step toward specie payments, then I am in favor of it, however costly it may be. Now, what is the fact? Does any gentleman believe that we shall ever have resumption of specie payments until we get back to our old standard of gold with a subsidiary coinage of silver? Are we not bound to do that? And if we cannot do both at once, shall we show our unwillingness to do the one thing it is possible for us to do? That is the whole question. We have now coined, in pursuance of law, $14,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin, upon which we have lost nothing. The gentleman from New York says we have lost $1,000,000. Even counted in gold, the difference is only $222,000, will be seen by the following statement from the Director of the Mint:

The amount of silver bullion purchased under the act of January 14, 1875, has been 11,130,072 standard ounces, at an average rate or price of 109 cents per ounce standard in gold coin, the cost of which bullion was $12,239,643.

The present rate in London is 541 pence, which corresponds with 107 cents per ounce United States standard, and makes the depreciation of the stock in the hands of the Government about $222,000, and not $1,000,000, as stated by Mr.

With silver at 107 cents per ounce United States standard, a dollar in subsidiary silver coins is of the gold value of eighty-six cents. Gold was  $114\frac{1}{2}$  yesterday, which makes the greenback dollar worth eighty-seven cents and three mills.

What shall we do with that amount of silver coin? Shall we turn back on our tracks and refuse to issue it or shall we issue it in place of the perishable, wasting, uncertain paper currency that now circulates for change? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Wells] has shown that there has been lost by wastage in the hands of the people about $15,000,000 of this paper fractional currency.

\*These countries, France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, coin a silver five-franc piece on the basis or ratio of  $15\frac{1}{2}$  to 1. This coin is an unlimited tender in payment. All denominations below it are subsidiary and limited tender.

these very poor laboring people for which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] has so much sympathy have suffered all or nearly all that loss

Now shall we put into their hands a currency less perishable? Shall we familiarize the American people with the use of coin, of the coin recognized under our eld laws, our laws before the war? Or shall we put off this opportunity which is now open to us to educate the people by putting in their hands $25,000,000 of coin money, of lawful coin, although it is subsidiary coin and not up to the full value of gold? It is a legal tender, and by law it is the lawful coin of the country. Shall we do that much toward resumption of specie payments? Shall we do that much toward resumption of specie payments?

Mr. KELLEY. Legal-tenders to what amount?

Mr. GARFIELD. To the amount of $5. Shall we do that much now, when we can, when we have already half done it? We have half enough silver coin ready to be issued for the purpose of supplying what everybody knows will be a sufficient amount of change for the business of the country. And if we do just as much more as we have already done we shall have made the substitution complete. We can then dismiss an army of clerks and counters and workmen who are now making our paper fractional currency, and in the common school of the silver currency we can begin the work of educating our school of the silver currency we can begin the work of educating our people up to the gold standard when the time comes.

I hope we will not go back on our policy; that we will not here show our unwillingness to resume specie payments, when we can hurt nobody, when we will be wronging nobody, when we will not be affecting injuriously any great interest of the country. No one pretends that this will produce any shock to business. The stock argument used against our resuming payments in gold does not apply to this. It is safe, easy, and economical; it is honest; it is keeping good faith for us so to do. I dare not vote against it, for in so doing I should take a step toward repudiation; I should aid in breaking the public faith. I shall vote for this measure whatever its origin, democratic or republican.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. How much time have I remaining?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time left.
Mr. PAGE. Of course it will not be expected that in five minutes
I shall attempt to discuss the merits of this bill.

I shall attempt to discuss the merits of this bill.

There has been an attempt on the part of some of those who have spoken upon this bill to make it appear that California and the Pacific coast, and particularly Nevada, have a different interest in the passage of this bill from the rest of the country. Sir, the Pacific coast, including California, Nevada, and Oregon, have purchased from the Government of the United States $4,000,000 of this silver circulating realizations this circumstance in four which they have said the medium, this silver subsidiary coin, for which they have paid the Government dollar for dollar in gold. I trust it will not again be charged that the Pacific coast will be particularly benefited by this bill more than any other section of country, providing as it does for recalling from circulation $16,000,000 of paper fractional currency and substituting a similar amount of silver coin.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] said the other day that this bill proposes to give to the laboring men of the country a silver coin which is worth from four to five cents on the dollar less than the paper fractional currency now in use. If the gentleman will go to San Francisco and purchase of a merchant a bill of goods and offer to pay for it with greenbacks, that merchant would add to his bill at least the difference between gold and greenbacks, from 12 to 13 per cent. But if he should propose to pay for the goods in silver coin there would be no addition at all to the bill. Silver coin is today used upon the Pacific coast at par with gold, notwithstanding the charge that silver is variable in value, in the payment of all bills, with the exception that in the case of a large amount of silver coin there is a small discount, as a matter of course. The inconvenience of having this large amount of silver coin on hand would cause perhaps a discount of 11 or 2 per cent.

But, Mr. Chairman, I contend that the Revised Statutes fix the But, Mr. Chairman, I contend that the Kevised Statutes hx the value of your silver coin. Congress can make it of any value it pleases; it can make a dollar in silver equal to the dollar in gold. But Congress has debased this silver coin for the purpose of preventing it from being sent out of the country. Two silver half-dollars are not the equal in value of a dollar in gold coin; but the Congress of the United States can make two silver half-dollars equal intrinsically in value to a gold dollar.

in value to a gold dollar.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] attempted the other day to make this House believe that since the act of January 14, 1875, day to make this House believe that since the act of January 14, 1875, was passed the republican party had experienced great good luck in the subsequent discovery of the great Bonanza mine of Nevada. Why, Mr. Chairman, one year ago last December stock in the Consolidated Virginia mine, known as the Bonanza mine, was worth $750 a share, a higher price than it is selling for to-day. So that the republican party were not "going it blind" when they passed the act providing for the redemption of the fractional currency, for the Bonanza mine instead of being struck some three months afterward. Bonanza mine, instead of being struck some three months afterward, as the gentleman supposes, was quoted in the market at that time higher than the stock is selling at to-day.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that the Government now proposes to sell its silver to the people of this country for paper, while California has paid in gold coin for her $4,000,000 of silver, so that she will suffer by this measure a loss of between $400,000 and $500,000, yet, as a Representative from that State, favoring as I do the resumption of specie payments at an early day, I cannot stand here to say one word against this bill, but shall on the contrary give it my hearty support.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, when I heard the opening remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewirr] the other day, upon the first discussion of this bill, I congratulated myself, as did the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that at last we had come across a democratic statesman who had promised to discuss this question without regard to party. But I had not list-ened for two minutes nor heard more than two or three sentences before I found that the gentleman's remarks in their whole tenor and tone were of an intensely partisan character. He endeavored by every art and artifice in his power to rally to the defeat of this bill the democratic forces. He called upon them in every way whereby he could appeal to democratic prejudice to oppose the bill. He held up before them the great Bonanza and the rich mine-holders of Nevada, and indulged in some seemingly unparliamentary remarks concerning his peers in the other end of the Capitol: the silver-min-ing Senators from Nevada. He endeavored to impress upon his political associates that if this bill should pass and should be a failure it would be attributed to the democratic party and they would have to bear the ignominy, if there be such attached to its failure; that if it should be a success then the republican party would point to it as a republican measure and claim the merit of having enacted it into a law. He endeavored, therefore, by every possible means to rally them, hoping that whenever the vote should be taken they would come to his support as the Alpine warriors sprang up on the hillside at the bugle-call of Roderick Dhu.

He endeavored to impress upon the mind of the House the fact that if this bill should pass the poor man was to be robbed; that the measure would take from him a portion of his hard-earned wages and was fikely to impose upon him a larger burden than he is now obliged to bear. His argument was that as silver was depreciating it would buy less of gold than paper would buy, and that therefore the poor would suffer the burden of the difference between the gold value of the fractional currency and the gold value of silver coin. But unfor-tunately for his own argument he admitted in two different places in his speech that the subsidiary coins, such as are contemplated, can be floated in the country for the benefit of the public without causing any depreciation or any loss to the people. He has told you that although there has been a fall in the price of silver within four months yet it may be possible to put subsidiary silver coins into circulation without their leaving the country or going into the melting-pot unless gold should advance to 120 or the price of silver should again rise in the London market. In this paragraph he has abandoned the whole tenor of his speech, which was to endeavor to impress upon us the idea that the fall of silver was going to be a burden upon the wages of labor. But he abandons it still more frankly and still more fully when he comes a little further down in his speech and says:

So long as the silver coin is worth less than the fractional currency, and is not in excess of the absolute needs of the community, it will continue to circulate without raising prices upon the poor, just as any money tokens, no matter of what material made, will to a limited extent circulate in any community without regard to their intrinsic value.

Here, then, is a total abandonment of the whole idea that he was endeavoring to infuse into the minds of members and an acknowledgment that the silver coinage, although it might be worth less in the market to purchase gold, would still circulate sufficiently or so far as might be necessary for the purpose of supplying the every-day wants of the community.

But notwithstanding all this, he still goes on endeavoring to impress upon us the idea that silver in all probability will rapidly fall, and that the difference between the purchasing power of silver and the purchasing power of fractional currency will be so great as to be a burden upon all the working classes of the community. speech he answers himself on another point, when he quotes from the London Morning Times as follows:

Bar silver was in strong demand yesterday, and in the absence of supplies was nominally quoted at 53½ to 53½ pence per ounce. The more the circumstances under which the fall in silver has occurred are considered, the clearer does it become that they could hardly have been more unfavorable to permanent recovery. Apart from the diminished demand for export to the East, the demonetization by Germany, the temporary stoppage by several nations of their mints, and the increased production of mines, it seems to be evident that silver, as a standard of value, either in combination with gold or by itself, has had its day in Europe. To attempt to force this country into using it again as a legal tender side by side with gold is as impossible as to restore the old gasches in the place of railways.

That, too, answers the other argument, be made, that silver might.

That, too, answers the other argument he made, that silver might rise in price to such extent it would be exported instead of being

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has attempted to impress upon the minds of all who listened to him the propriety and necessity of the minds of all who listened to him the propriety and necessity of the minds of all who listened to him the propriety and necessity of keeping up paper currency among the people instead of silver coin, and he quoted the Latin maxim Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes, which, being properly interpreted according to his doctrine, means that democratic rags are better than republican silver. [Langhter.]
I want to say if there be any doubt or difficulty in regard to the silver coin contemplated for circulation in the country, that difficulty is remedied by the amendment I have proposed, which I ask the

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the printed bill insert these words, namely: Provided, That all such coins shall be exchangeable at par by the assistant treasurers and designated depositaries for United States notes in sums not less than $3: and shall be receivable for postage and revenue stamps and for all dues to the United States, except customs, in sums not over $5, and shall be redeemed on presentation at the Treasury of the United States in such sums and under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, also, That the total issue of such coins shall not exceed at their nominal value the sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Certainly. Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Let me ask him whether the effect of his amendment is not to redeem republican silver in democratic rags? [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the chief objections which have been made to the substitution of the silver coins for the fractional currency are

1. That it will be a depreciation of the currency.
2. That the value of the silver may rise or that of the greenback depreciate to a point that would render it profitable to melt or export, and the people thereby put to serious inconvenience for want of

The first objection is readily answered. There is no proposition to depreciate the silver coins. On the contrary, the bill provides for the issue of silver coins of the same weight and purity as have been issued by the Mint since 1853, and which have been since then a legal tender to the extent of $5. In fact, the coins proposed to be issued are slightly more valuable than those coined from 1853 to 1873, as they contain, I am informed, one grain and eight-tenths more standard silver to the dollar, this addition to the weight having been prescribed by the coinage act of 1873, the object being to make the silver subsidiary coin of $1 conform to the weight and value of the five-franc silver coin of Europe, and, I believe, of the dollar of some of the South American states. The business of a community cannot be carried on without change-money. Since gold is not coinable into the divisions of a dollar, silver coins of a higher nominal value than bullion value are used by all nations, except such as have the single sil-

The silver subsidiary coins of the United States have a higher value as compared relatively with gold than those of any other country, as will be seen from a statement which I present, prepared at my request by the Director of the Mint:

All silver coins less than the five-franc piece are subsidiary, and the relative val-uation, based on such subsidiary coins, would be 1 to 13.2.

This statement shows that in France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland the legal ratio of the small silver-change money to the gold coins is as  $13\frac{9}{10}$  to 1; Great Britain,  $14\frac{9}{10}$  to 1; Germany,  $13\frac{9}{10}$  to 1; Sweden, Denmark, and Norway,  $14\frac{8}{10}$  to 1; United States,  $14\frac{9}{100}$  to 1, or nearly 15 to 1. We therefore give a silver coin to our people more valuable than either of the countries named.

The fractional currency is a promise to pay, redeemable in legal-tender notes, both debts. The material of these notes is perishable, and as money has no intrinsic value such as silver has.

It is depicted here that a great robbery is to be perpetrated by the issue of these coins on the poor, and we are asked by the gentleman from New York to wait until "silver has settled down to something like a steady price and we are prepared to resume specie payments generally. Silver coins will, as of old, if not redundant in amount, fill a useful and necessary place in the currency of this and other countries.

Let me say in reply, this same depreciation will exist whenever they may be issued, now or hereafter; whether as I propose, or as is indicated. This picture is overdrawn of the injury to the poor, for indicated. This picture is overdrawn of the injury to the poor, for five silver dollars will in all ordinary transactions buy as much as a five-dollar gold piece. Nay, more; if the substitution of a silver coin for irredeemable paper money is robbery, then our present condition is one of a robbery of the poor every day in the circulation of paper money inferior in value to gold, and which only possesses about the same purchasing power at its nominal value as the silver coins proposed now to be substituted.

If the issue is restricted as provided for by law I think these silver coins will maintain a purchasing power equal with legal-tender notes, or even gold, in small payments and in change, even when we shall resume specie payments in full.

resume specie payments in full.

After the limit of substitution is reached of silver coin for fractional currency, then no further issue of silver coin can take place beyond such amount, except for gold coins at par, under the coinage act. yond such amount, except for gold coins at par, under the coinage act. The entire amount of substituted silver coin proposed will be needed and actually employed as change-money, and being procurable only from mints for gold coin at par, a redundancy is impossible.

This check and the limited amount for which they are a legal tender will effectually check any of the evils predicted, and no loss can result to the people, as it will be current at its nominal value.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] also spoke of the evis of a depreciated and defective coin currency in England, as devicted by Macanlay which was by climings until hearrely recognized.

evis of a depreciated and defective coin currency in England, as depicted by Macaulay, which was by clippings until 'scarcely recognizable; but if we had followed that historian a few years, he would have also told us of the prosperity which followed the recoinage and the issue of silver to the amount £7,000,000, or nearly $35,000,000.

What we propose is not the issue of debased coin, but coin of standard value, of authorized weight and purity under the coinage act, and we were all in the proposed by the proposed by the proposed in the more valuable than issued by the more enlightened countries of Europe.

The fractional currency requires constant renewal, living from nine to fifteen months, to be again and again renewed at great cost, as has been shown by Mr. Wells, a member of the Appropriation Committee. Away from centers this currency becomes worn and muti-lated. The great benefit of gold and silver coin as a circulating medium is that no advantage is derived by the brokers and money-changers over the poor, for the fractional currency is more easily counterfeited. I am free to confess, however, in this respect that the Government has availed itself of every caution to prevent such illicit issue. The fact stands out, nevertheless. The loss to the people in destroyed fractional currency has been enormous. Some estimate it up to ten or twelve millions. The metal is not destroyed even by fire.

I now come to the second objection, that the silver may not remain out by reason of an increased value in gold premium or in silver premium, or in both. I would be gratified if some provision of law could be enacted which would appreciate the greenback, or that such a condition of trade causes could be reached to produce the same result, for then the silver would remain out with certainty; in the absence of such a condition of things we must encounter some risk, but before we adjourn the success or failure of this undertaking will be settled, and if we have erred it is in our reach promptly to correct. Silver bullion will be in excess of our requirements, and there is no reason for us to apprehend a rise in gold much above the present rate.

We are told to have fear of Germany in connection with this silver problem. Her neighbors, France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, where the double standard of gold and silver prevails, have recently protected themselves against any act of Germany in this respect by action in what may be termed a silver convention at Brussels, as stated in a letter to me from our Director of the Mint.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT, March 6, 1876.

DEAR SIR: In further reply to your inquiries relative to the silver question, I have to inform you that we now have the result of the silver convention recently held at Brussels, Belgium.

The convention fixed the limit of the silver coinage for 1876, for the countries named as follows:

nameu, as ionows:
	Francs.
France	54, 000, 000
Italy	36, 000, 000
Belgium	11, 000, 000
Switzerland	7, 000, 000

108, 000, 000

Of which 30,000,000 francs have already been coined by France, leaving 78,000,000 francs as the amount which may be coined during the balance of this year.

The amount of silver required for this coinage will not exceed $15,000,000, which is a mere trifle compared with the supplies likely to come on the market.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN, Director.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL.

Mr. RANDALL. Why, sir, France alone coined $60,000,000 in five-franc pieces in 1873. These countries are practically closed against silver, thus to avoid an influx of such from Germany. I will now show the relative value of the silver dollar and the greenback dollar for each day since January 1 to March 15 of this year, which exhibits the fact that the silver dollar has averaged about 2 per cent. less in gold value than the greenback and that the silver dollar has not at any time in that period risen above the greenback. If this coin had been put out by the Secretary on the day first named, January 1, not a dollar of it would have been exported or melted.

The check of law on the issue will prevent a redundancy, and, with the limit as to legal-tender, will without doubt preserve the purchasing power with the division limitations under the dollar.

One other fact ought to be mentioned. At the time we lost our stock of silver coin after the war commenced, silver was worth in London sixty-one pence per ounce; it is now worth fifty-three pence. We will therefore replace our stock of coin at seventeen cents per ounce less.

This silver once out will tell its own story, as it did in England at the time the gentleman from New York failed to mention, as described, under a recoinage, by Macaulay. I am willing to try this experiment, and, further, to advise others to do so, in view of the great benefits to the people which must accrue, not to the Bonanza interest, but to all the people. • Mr. Chairman, there are various bonanza interests which ought Mr. Chairman, there are various bonanza interests which ought not to be forgotten in the discussion of this proposition. There is a bonanza interest of gold, there is a bonanza interest of silver, and there is a bonanza interest of nickel. There is also a bonanza interest not yet mentioned, and that is the bonanza interest of the bank-note engraving companies. I could show by reports to Congress that from 1863 to 1874 these bank-note companies in New York and elsewhere, now resisting this substitution of silver for paper fractional currency, received more than $9,000,000 from the Government. It is important to them therefore to obstruct this substitution, because they have a direct pecuniary interest in keeping afloat paper fractional currency. In conclusion, let me say this bill only asks the substitution of silrer coin for paper fractional currency. It can safely be done, as silver coin will remain in circulation so long as gold is below 1.20. Silver is now from 2 to 5 per cent. below the greenback, and being the least valuable, will circulate. Besides, being an overvalued coin the Government stamp, it will be barred from exportation as bullion.

The relative cost of production also comes into view here as one advantage in favor of silver, and it was one of the grounds upon which we based our action in favor of this bill. The coining of silver costs about 1½ per cent. of its face value, while as to fractional currency it is disputed whether it costs 3½ or 5 per cent. of its face value. Silver is one of the constitutional legal-tenders, and continues in use for fifty years on the average, and then the loss is only to the extent of wear; while, on the contrary, fractional currency lives only for fifteen months.

I propose for the moment, Mr. Chairman, to look at this question in a political aspect. I would like to know when it ceased to be a democratic measure or a part of the democratic doctrine to stop the issue of silver coin. It is a coin recognized in the Constitution of our country. It is inseparable from the traditions of the democratic party. That great democratic light, Silas Wright, author of the sub-treasury system, which I have been taught to believe one of the greatest blessings which evar overtook a people, distinctly recognizes gold and silver as the only constitutional currency for this country. In my judgment, until we do restore gold and silver, of course by gradual means and not suddenly to the serious injury of business—I say until we do reach specie payment we cannot reach that full measure of prosperity which the great material resources of the country and the industry and energy of our people so richly promise.

Mr. HÖLMAN. I desire to submit as an additional section to the bill what I send to the desk. I ask that it may be reported by the

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all the amendments that have been sent up have simply been read for information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the bill is open to amendments, and it is totally immaterial when the amendments come in. no rule to prevent any number of amendments from being offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I may state that I have no wish to prevent any amendments being submitted. I am willing that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] shall present his amendment along with all the other amendments; and after they have all been presented I shall move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House. I shall then in the House ask the previous question, so that by one step after another we shall reach a vote on every amend-

Mr. HOLMAN. It will then be understood—that is the effect of the proposition of my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—that by unanimous consent all amendments offered here may be brought into the House. Without unanimous consent some of them might be brought into the House in accordance with the rules and some might not.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course I only mean such amendments as are germane

Mr. HOLMAN. But, even if germane to the bill, it may be that more amendments will be offered than are admissible under the rules. I therefore ask unanimous consent that amendments being germane may be offered to the bill in committee and brought into the House may be offered to the bill in committee and brought into the House for action. In this way a fairer expression of opinion can be had than if the rules are strictly enforced. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] will see that if this is not agreed to, while every gentleman has a right to offer his amendment and have it voted on in Committee of the Whole—this being a revenue measure—he has not the right to have it brought before the House unless it be adopted in committee. It therefore set numinous consent that grantlemen may committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may submit their various propositions, and that they may be voted on in the House in the order in which they are presented.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to get an opportunity for a vote to be had in the House on every amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appro-The CHAIRMAN. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations allow the Chair to make a suggestion, so that the proper order may be maintained? The amendments may, by consent of the committee, be regarded as all pending, and as pending in the order in which they have been offered. They have not been directly offered, because there has been no reading of the bill by sections or clauses as yet. But if the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to be carried out by consent of the committee, all the amendments that have been offered or may be offered prior to the rising of the committee may be considered as pending to the bill when reported.

Mr. KASSON. So far as germane. Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is a very important and a very wise one; that is, that these amendments offered in the Committee of the Whole cannot properly test the sense of the House, or afford any record by which our constituents can know our action, unless unanimous consent be given that they may be offered in the House. I hope that unanimous consent will be given, and I ask the gentleman from Indiana to make that request for unanimous consent to apply to all the appropriation and revenue bills which are discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will bear in mind that this is the bill pending now. It is a very good rule here.

I agree with the gentleman to that extent.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask if gentlemen contemplate the usual five-minutes debate on amendments in committee?

Mr. RANDALL. We have discussed this bill very thoroughly.

Mr. KELLEY. But there are a number of amendments, and those amendments need discussion. I believe the rule is that in Committee of the Whole amendments may be submitted, and five minutes' debate had upon them.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make this suggestion: I am willing to ask that in the House five minutes shall be allowed in advocacy of an amendment, and five minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. KELLEY. I would rather have the five-minutes debate in the Committee of the Whole. There are very nice distinctions between the amendments, and they are very important ones, and I would like to hear from the authors and opponents of those amendments their reasons. This is a grave question, the question whether we shall add $1,260,000 a year to our gold indebtedness for the purchase of a depreciating commodity-

A Member. That is debate.

Mr. KELLEY. And its conversion into coin. That is a grave question, and I think is entitled to consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that that is under the control of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I move, with that understanding, that the committee rise, and report the bill and all the amendments to the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the committee will not rise and report the

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I desire to offer an amendment.
Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from making any further increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage. But silver bullion shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be received by the several mints for fabrication into subsidiary coins and paid for in such coins at a rate or price per ounce, to be fixed from time to time, according to the market rate, by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the basis of the difference between the par value of such coin and the value of such bullion, and an addition not exceeding 1 per cent, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be made to the purchasing price as an allowance for the transportation of the coin. And the excess of the par value of such coin over the value of the bullion so deposited, less the amount that shall be allowed for transportation, as aforesaid, determined as above provided, shall be from time to time covered into the Treasury, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct: Provided, however, That such silver coins of the denominations aforesaid and the silver bullion, now owned by the United States, shall not exceed in par value the par value of the fractional currency now authorized by law.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illipois.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

Add to section 2:

Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into dollars, half-dollars, quarters, and dimes, at the standard value of such coin, paying the Government the cost of such coinage. And the mint at which such deposit of bullion may be made shall coin the same in the order of the delivery of said bullion at the mint.

Mr. KELLEY. Will private citizens receive them when they are worn half away?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] yield for the discussion of the amendments offered?
Mr. RANDALL. I do not yield.
The CHAIRMAN. Then discussion is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me three minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I propose when we go into the House to allow five minutes' debate upon each amendment for and against.

Mr. HOLMAN. I fully concur in the course suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] but I hope the chairman of the committee will remember that when he is acting by unanimous consent it is well enough to be a little more than fair.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN:]

Provided. That if silver bullion is not presented for coinage in sufficient quantity to meet the demand for the redemption of fractional currency the Secretary of the Treasury may, under the provision of the act of May 14, 1875, purchase silver bullion for the purpose of coinage, as provided in this act.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

In the tenth line, after the words "United States," strike out the balance of the second section and insert the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall not be authorized to further increase the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sales of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the second section and insert;
SEC. 2. That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000 to provide for engraving, printing, and other expenses of making and issuing United States fractional currency of existing denominations.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. It has been proposed that these amendments now offered should be printed. I would inquire whether all the amendments heretofore offered to this bill will not be printed likewise?

The CHAIRMAN. That depends upon the action of the House. Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with all the pending amendments to the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the committee will not rise for that purpose.

The question was taken on Mr. RANDALL's motion; and it was agreed to.

agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Springer having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Sayler reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States instead of fractional currency, and had come to no resolution thereon, and had directed him to report it back to the House with sundry amendments pending thereto.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask the House to confirm the agreement made by unanimous consent in Committee of the Wholes of that when the bill and amendments are considered in the House there may be allowed five minutes' debate upon each amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee of the Whole had no power to make any arrangement to bind the House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will please state what agreement he pro-

Mr. RANDALL. I understood that it was unanimously agreed in Committee of the Whole that we should report the bill and all the amendments to the House and allow five minutes' discussion on each amendment in favor of it and five minutes against each amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the order of the House unless objection be made. The Chair hears none.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the bill and all the pending amendments be printed in bill form for the use of the House. The motion was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES AND EMPLOYÉS IN THE INDIAN SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

To the House of Representatives :

In further answer to the resolution of the House of the 6th of January last, with regard to certain expenditures and employes in the Indian service, except those on duty in the Office of the Secretary of the Interior, &c., I have the honor to transmit to you a supplementary report received from the Secretary of the Interior respecting and explaining a clerical error to be found in that portion of the statement of the Interior Department which relates to the expenditures of the board of Indian commissioners, and to ask its consideration in connection with the papers which accompanied my message of the 3d of February last.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication received from the chairman of the board on behalf of the United States Executive Departments, containing in detail the operations of the board, and setting forth the present embarrassments under which it is now laboring in the endeavor to conduct the participation of the Government in the centennial exhibition, and showing very clearly the necessity of additional funds to carry out the undertaking in a creditable manner.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 27, 1876.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the message and accompanying documents be printed, and referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Exhibition.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN DEFICIENCIES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced that the Speaker had appointed the following as the conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for certain Indians: Mr. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. HAMILTON of New Jersey, and Mr. HALE

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Mackey, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence for five days on account of sickness.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, was granted indefinite leave of absence from the 28th instant on account of important business.

Mr. Hartridge was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. Blaine was granted leave of absence for ten days.

CHARGES AGAINST GEORGE F. SEWARD.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House any information or facts bearing upon the business of the consular agent of the United States at Shanghai, China, while under the administration of George F. Seward, late consul-general at that port, and now envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States near the court of the Emperor of China, together with such correspondence as has been had with that officer in matters of accounts and the manner of transacting the business of his office; also, correspondence between the years 1862 and 1874 between the Treasury Department and the State Department in reference to this officer's official transactions.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. DIBRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on

Whereas by the Constitution of the United States the people of the several States

Whereas by the Constitution of the United States the people of the several States are secured in their possessions from unreasonable searches and seizures and assured that their right to private property shall not be violated nor taken for public use without just compensation; and whereas these provisions were originally intended to apply to the people of all the States alike; and whereas the southern claims commission, now sitting in Washington City, District of Columbia, by authority of an act of Congress, to pass and decide upon the claims of the people of the South for property taken during the late war, are reported as deciding said claims not according to the proof and law, but from unofficial and merely unsworn statements of secret spies and informers, thus violating that provision of the Constitution which secures to the citizen a just compensation for property taken by the Government: Therefore, **Beit resolved**. That a committee of —— be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to hear proof and report to this House, first, whether or not said commission is acting in accordance with the law under which they are appointed and the Constitution they are sworn to support; second, whether or not they are authorized by law to employ secret spies and informers, and, if so, by whom are they appointed, and under what law and by whom are they appointed, and under what law and by whom are they appointed, and under what law and by commission appears to the Government; fourth, and as the existence of a secret police or spies in a free country is a standing menace to the liberties of the people, and a public declaration of a want of confidence in the integrity and honesty of the people, let them report whether or not it would not be to the best interest of the Government to dispense with their services, and whether or not the honor of the Government would not be best subserved by the dissolution of said commission.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. The annual post-route bill has been returned to-day from the Senate with sundry amendments. It is important that the bill should be passed as soon as possible, and in order that the amendments of the Senate may be considered and reported to the House to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent that they be now taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

No objection was made, and accordingly the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads were taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I now insist on my motion to adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 28, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KEY presented the petition of Mrs. Mary A. Lord, widow of Henry E. Lord, late captain of Company G, Thirty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, paying for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE presented two memorials of citizens of the counties of Berks and Allegheny, in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST. I present, in the nature of a memorial to Congress, joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, in favor of pensions to the veterans of the war with Mexico, their widows and minor orphans. I move their reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of workingmen of the county of Erie, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the proposed amendments to the tariff laws; and a similiar memorial signed by workingmen of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York, protesting in like manner. I move that these two memorials go to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a memorial of merchants in the city of Buffalo, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act, and praying that amendments which they propose may be made to the existing law. I move that it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I present joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, in favor of the proposed repeal of compulsory pilot laws, with an accompanying letter from the governor of the State. I move their reference to the Committee on Commerce, and that the resolutions be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Jackson County, Ohio, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance

Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of Dr. L. J. Draper, late assistant surgeon, United States Navy, praying to be restored to his former rank and position in the Navy, from which he was dismissed by the Secretary of the Navy without court-martial in 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Appleton, Lancaster & Co., Thomas D. Mitchell, and other merchants of Lexington, Kentucky, praying for the passage of the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives repealing the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of 173 pensioners of the United States, citizens of Indiana, praying for the continuance of the present system of paying pensions; which was referred to the Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

He also presented the petition of D. P. Whedon, late United States district attorney for the second district of Utah praying for increased district attorney for the second district of Utah, praying for increased compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of E. T. Cox, State geologist of Indiana, and 8 others, praying that the Senate may without delay ratify the convention that has been entered into by the leading nations of the world for the establishment and maintenance of an international bureau of weights and measures, with the object of promoting permanence, precision, and uniformity in the standards, at the joint charge of the contracting powers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GORDON presented the petition of N. J. Hammond, Hillyer & Brother, and other citizens of Atlanta, Georgia, praying the passage of the bill which lately passed the House of Representatives repealing the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions of the Irish Literary Society in relation to the imprisonment of Edward O'Meagher Condon, in Great Britain; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of W. I. Hines, J. M. Roe, and 392 other members of the greenback club of Buchanan, Michigan, praying Congress to repeal the resumption law of 1875, and make greenbacks a full legal-tender except for the payment of gold bonds and gold interest; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William Loenthal and 120 others, praying for the passage of an act to equalize the bounties of all sol-diers who served during the late war, upon a basis of the actual term of service of each enlisted man; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 293) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to cancel and annul the condemnation of ground in square 762, in the city of Washington, for a public alley, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 445) for the relief of settlers on public lands in the State of California, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 828) to correct an error in enrollment, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the same committee to report back the bill (S. No. 263) to amend the laws relating to legal tender of silver coin, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to say a few words on that subject, and wish the bill to go on the Calendar.
Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly it will go on the Calendar. It is a ill reported with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 662) to provide for the survey of the Mc-Kenzie River, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 663) incorporating the Sioux City, Black Hills and Pacific Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 664) to improve the civil service of the Patent Office; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON asked, and by unauimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 635) repealing and declaring void certain sections of certain acts named therein; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 666) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make certain allowances to collectors in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

S. J. GHOLSON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there are no resolutions, I move to take up the House bill for the relief of the political disabilities of Samuel J. Gholson. It will take no time, of course. The committee report favorason. It will take no came, to bly upon it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of political disabilities imposed by the four-teenth amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Would it be proper to add any other names to the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment. Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then I move to add the name of Joseph E. Johnston, of Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to that. I would like to know upon what ground that is proposed?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Because I believe that he is as much entitled to a pardon as anybody else. He left the service of this country not in disgrace, but rather under circumstances favorable to himself. Like all the men who went into the rebel army, he fought against us with all his vigor, and did his duty there with great tought against us with all his vigor, and did his duty there with greateredit to himself and perhaps injury to us; but not with more injury than any other of the rebel officers did who were educated at West Point. I think he is as much entitled to relief as others. I have a personal knowledge of this gentleman. I had a good deal of intercourse with him at the beginning of the war, and I think that he was one of the best men who did leave the service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Pennsylvania evidently does not understand the principles upon which the Committee on the Judiciary proceed in respect of these cases, and in that we have been sustained by the Senate on all occasions; and that is, we do not report in favor of removing the disabilities of the few people who are now left who went into the rebellion under circumstances of particular criminality, unless those people individually apply by petition for that relief. Then, if we find that they have lived meritorious lives since the rebellion, and when they left the Army, if they did leave the Army, they left it by a fair and honorable resignation and paid up their bills, squared their accounts, so to speak, we recommend the relief. Those are the principles upon which we stand. I think they commend themselves to the judgment of my honorable friend whom I am chiefly addressing. I hope he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not understand that General Johnston has made application. In all the other requisites mentioned by the Senator from Vermont he is entitled to relief. He has not asked it; and if his name cannot be added to a bill of this kind, if it is a dangerous precedent, of course I do not desire to persevere in my presentation of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. You had better withdraw it. It breaks up the whole principle we are acting on.
Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw it for the present.
Mr. WHYTE. I move to insert the name of W. H. Jenifer, of Baltimore, Maryland.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same objection exists to that. I do not wish to take time by discussing it.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. Jenifer filed his petition at the beginning of the session of Congress, asking that his disabilities might be removed, and the case has been in the Judiciary Committee I believe from that day to this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, and until a vote of the Senate is taken discharging that committee it will stay there until we investigate it and know that the petition is regular and true and that the other principles which we apply to these cases exist in that case. It will receive due consideration in its order, and not out of it, unless the Senate so direct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte.]

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senate voting in favor thereof.

SERVICE OF WRITS OF MANDAMUS.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senate to take up a bill which I think

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senate to take up a bill which I think will require but a moment, reported yesterday, which I spoke of as needing an early consideration. It is the bill authorizing one member of a firm to give a bond upon the importation of goods.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I gave notice yesterday that I would call up a bill which has been pending here some little while. I do not know that it would take a great deal of time. There is only a little of the morning hour taken up yet, and if my friend will allow this bill to take its place according to the notice, I would be glad, unless he is satisfied that the bill he proposes will lead to no discussion at all.

Mr. CONKLING. There is notedy in all the earth that I would

Mr. CONKLING. There is nobody in all the earth that I would like to do a generous thing for better than my friend from New Jersey. I remind him, however, that I was about to ask the Senate to consider this bill yesterday, and withdrew my request, because he intimated a wish to go on with another bill. This is a matter in which his constituents as well as mine are considerably interested. I do not think it will lead to discussion; but whether it will or not I will not press it against the Senator, even if I can, if he has anything he wishes to do. But I see the fates are with the Senator from New Jersey. The bill is not here. It is No. 2135, and is not in the files; so I cannot go on.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 13, to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been reported and printed since it has been amended, it will now be read as amended. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the circuit courts of the United States shall, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, issue writs of mandamus or other common-law writs, and the party or persons to whom said writs shall be directed shall, for any cause, neglect or fail to perform the act or duty required by the said writ or writs, the court from which said writ issues may, upon the application of the person for whose benefit the writ is issued, besides or instead of proceeding against the defendant by attachment, direct that the act required to be done shall be done by some person appointed by the court, at the expense of the defendant, to be recovered by the same process, by and along with the cost of said writ or writs; and when snot courts shall have rendered judgment against any municipal corporation or county, of any officer or officers of such corporation or county, for the recovery of any sum of money, and it is necessary to levy and collect a tax for the payment thereof, the said courts shall have power, through the proper officers of such corporation or county, or through the persons appointed as aforesaid, to levy and collect such a tax as may be necessary to pay such judgment, together with the costs of such procedure. of such procedure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President— Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me? Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. For what purpose?

Mr. WITHERS. Simply for a statement.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.
Mr. WITHERS. My colleague [Mr. Johnston] is absent necessarily in consequence of sickness in his family. He requested me, if this particular bill should be called up for consideration, to ask for its postponement until such time as he could return, as he expected and desired to address the Senate upon the merits of the bill. I dislike to make any objection to the present consideration of the bill in view of the fact that the Senator who has it in charge has exhibited the most courteous deference to the wishes of Senators on this side and has already to my knowledge postponed the consideration of the bill at their request several times. I therefore simply state the views of my colleague on the subject and leave it to the Senator from New Jersey to grant the request or otherwise, as he may see proper.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the word "writs" where it occurs in the fourteenth line.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words to be stricken out are as follows:

And when such courts shall have rendered judgment against any municipal corporation or county, or any officer or officers of such corporation or county, for the recovery of any sum of money, and it is necessary to levy and collect a tax for the payment thereof, the said courts shall have power, through the proper officers of such corporation or county, or through the persons appointed as aforesaid, to levy and collect such a tax as may be necessary to pay such judgment, together with the cents of such proceedings. costs of such procedure.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in reference to the bill as it now stands. When a law is to be passed, the proper inquiry is, what is the evil that is sought to be remedied? The evil is simply this: Municipal corporations in a number of States of the Union, such as cities, townships, counties, have, by their Legislatures, been authorized to issue bonds for the building of railroads and for other purposes. The same law which authorized the issue of the bonds provided that the municipality should be taxed at a given the bonds provided that the municipality should be taxed at a given rate, 1 per cent. or a 1 per cent. as the fact might be, a sum sufficient to pay the interest on those bonds. On the credit of those bonds, railroads have been constructed. The inhabitants of the municipality have the convenience resulting from them and their property has been appreciated by those railroads. For one or two years, the coupons are paid; then the default is made in the payment of the coupons. are instituted in the Federal courts and judgments obtained. next process is to issue an execution, which, of course, is returned "No goods," and the next process is a mandamus from the court directing the proper officers of the county or other municipality to proceed to execute the State law and to raise the sum which the State has di-rected should be raised. The penalty, if the officer does not perform this duty, is punishment for contempt of the mandate of the court. To avoid this punishment and to avoid raising the money, these offi-cers resign, and that, as the law stands, is an end of the power of the court. This act authorizes the court in the event of such resignation to appoint other persons to carry out the directions of the State and enforce the law and the judgment.

These bonds are held by individuals all over the United States. I saw a statement that in the State of Maine alone the savings-banks of that State have a million of dollars of them. They are held by persons of limited means in New Jersey.

Now, any person who thinks that a subordinate State officer by his wrongful act should defeat the judgment of the courts of the United States ought not to vote for this bill; but that any person who thinks that a subordinate State officer should not have that power should vote for this bill.

That a mandamus is the proper remedy in such case, I read from the second volume of Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 687:

Where the law under which the debt was incurred provides for the levy of a special tax to pay it, this duty will be enforced by mandamus, and in such a case it is no answer to an application for this remedy that an execution has not been returned nulla bona or that the corporation debtor may have property subject to a sale on ex-

The Federal courts, as the law now stands, have no power to enforce these judgments. They can only act through the officers appointed by the State. That has been settled in two cases: first, in the case of the board of levy in the State of Louisiana for the parishes of Carroll and Madison, which issued bonds. They would not levy the tax, although authorized by the State to do it. The creditors sought in that case by a bill in equity to enforce a contribution from the inhabitants, but the court said that that remedy would not answer; the only remedy was a mandamus, and the only manner in which a mandamus can be enforced is according to law.

That Congress has full power to pass this act and that it is a duty incumbent upon it, there can be no question. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

The Federal courts have no judicial power excepting as the Federal Legislature gives it to them, and we omit to perform a clear duty under the Constitution by refusing to pass such a law.

Story says, in his second volume, page 445:

To suppose that it is not an obligation on Congress to vest this power in the Federal courts, but that it might omit or decline to do it, is to suppose that, under the Constitution, Congress might defeat the Constitution itself.

That is in reference to the creation of inferior courts. And again, on page 435, he says:

The judiciary must be so organized as to carry into complete effect all the purposes of its establishment. It must at once possess the power and means to check usurpation and enforce the execution of its judgments.

The Constitution declares that Congress may create inferior tribu-The Constitution declares that Congress may create interior triunals and then provides that it shall have power to pass all laws to carry into effect the foregoing provision. In the case of The Supervisors rs. Rogers, which is reported in 7 Wallace, page 180, this question came before the court. The State of Iowa, for the enforcement of its State judgments, had passed such a law as we are now considering, providing that where the officers resigned the courts should have power to appoint other persons to perform their duties. By the laws of the United States the Federal courts have the right to adopt the procedure of the State courts; and in that case, where the officers who had to levy and collect the tax resigned, the circuit court of the United States, following that State act, did appoint others to perform the duty, and the collection was made.

Not to pass this act seems to me to be the greatest injustice; it is to permit the Federal courts of the nation to be treated with contempt; it is the authorization on the part of Congress of repudiation. tempt; it is the authorization on the part of Congress of repudiation. If the judgments of a State court are not enforced, the fault is with the State Legislature; if the judgments of the national courts are not enforced, the fault is with the national Legislature. It is not the province of the State courts to see that the judgments of the Federal courts are enforced. If, as in the case of Iowa, the States wish to avoid the evil we are considering as to their State courts, they can pass such a law, and under such legislation the national court can come in and take advantage of the State procedure, but when in any State, as in New Jersey or in New York, there is no such necessity, there being no such resignations by the officers, it then becomes incumbent on us to supply that defect of legislation.

on us to supply that defect of legislation.

Besides, Mr. President, this law would be of more advantage to the townships, counties, and cities that it is intended to reach than any law that can be passed. It will be a benefit to the debtor as well as to the creditor. The most important and valuable right that a State has is the right and power to make a contract; and nothing is a con-
